"The old man is a little previous," said the Senator-elect, speaking of the letter; "he doesn't quite understand that I haven't a vote in the Senate this session. But he has the right idea about that bill. At least he speaks the sentiments of every real soldier I have heard express an opinion on the subject. The men who did the actual fighting and have some pride in their record as soldiers don't want to be pauperized. There is not a man in my Grand Army post in favor of it. I don't think any considerable number of Grand Army posts can be got to support the movement to pass the bill over the President's veto. That veto message is the best thing President Cleveland has put his hand to, and if I were in the Senate I would vote to sustain him."

APPENDIX C.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S APPEALS FOR JUSTICE TO ALL WORTHY PENSIONERS BY THE PASSAGE OF GENERAL LAWS THAT SHALL GIVE TO LIKE CASES LIKE PENSIONS.

[From Cleveland's first annual message.]

While there is no expenditure of the public funds which the people more cheerfully approve than that made in recognition of the services of our soldiers living and dead, the sentiment underlying the subject should not be vitiated by the introduction of any fraudulent practices. Therefore it is fully as important that the rolls should be cleansed of all those who by fraud have secured a place thereon, as that meritorious claims should be speedily examined and adjusted. The reforms in the methods of doing the business of this bureau which have lately been inaugurated promise better results in both these directions.

[From Cleveland's second annual message.]

The report of the Commissioner of Pensions contains a detailed and most satisfactory exhibit of the operations of the Pension Bureau during the last fiscal year. The amount of work done was the largest in any year since the organization of the bureau; and it has been done at less cost than during the previous year in every division.

On the 30th day of June, 1886, there were 365,783 pensioners on the rolls of the bureau.

Since 1861 there have been 1,018,735 applications for pensions filed, of which 78,834 were based upon service in the war of 1812. There were 621,754 of these applications allowed, including 60,178 to the soldiers of 1812 and their widows.

The total amount paid for pensions since 1861 is $808,624,811.57.

The number of new pensions allowed during the year ended June 30, 1886, is 40,857—a larger number than has been allowed in any year save one since 1861; the names of 2,229 pensioners which had been previously dropped from the rolls were restored during the year, and after deducting those dropped within the same time for various causes a net increase remains for the year of 20,658 names.

From January 1, 1861, to December 1, 1885, 1,967 private pension acts had been passed. Since the last-mentioned date, and during the last session of the Congress, 644 such acts became laws.

It seems to me that no one can examine our pension establishment and its operations without being convinced that through its instrumentality justice can be very nearly done to all who are entitled under present laws to the pension bounty of the Government.

But it is undeniable that cases exist, well entitled to relief, in which the Pension Bureau is powerless to aid. The really worthy cases of this class are such as only lack by misfortune the kind or quantity of proof which the law and regulations of the Bureau require, or which, though their merit is apparent, for some other reason can not be justly dealt with through general laws. These conditions fully justify application to the Congress and special enactments; but resort to the Congress for a special pension act to overrule the deliberate and careful determination of the Pension Bureau on the merits or to secure favorable action when it could not be expected under the most liberal execution of general laws, it must be admitted, opens the door to the allowance of questionable claims, and presents to the legislative and executive branches of the Government applications concededly not within the law and plainly devoid of merit, but so surrounded by sentiment and patriotic feeling that they are hard to resist. I suppose it will not be denied that many claims for pension are made without merit, and that many have been allowed upon fraudulent representations. This has been declared from the Pension Bureau not only in this, but in prior administrations.

The usefulness and the justice of any system for the distribution of pensions depend upon the equality and uniformity of its operation.

The American people, with a patriotic and grateful regard for our ex-soldiers—too broad and too sacred to be monopolized by any special advocates—are not only willing but anxious that equal and exact justice should be done to all honest claimants for pensions. In their sight the friendless and destitute soldier, dependent on public charity, if otherwise entitled, has precisely the same right to share in the provision made for those who fought their country's battles as those better able, through friends and influence, to push their claims. Every pension that is granted under our present plan upon any other grounds than actual service and injury or disease incurred in such service, and every instance of the many in which pensions are increased on other grounds than the merits of the claim, work an injustice to the brave and crippled, but poor and friendless soldier, who is entirely neglected or who must be content with the smallest sum allowed under general laws.

There are far too many neighborhoods in which are found glaring cases of inequality of treatment in the matter of pensions; and they are largely due to a yielding in the Pension Bureau to importunity on the part of those, other than the pensioner, who are especially interested, or they arise from special acts passed for the benefit of individuals.

The men who fought side by side should stand side by side when they participate in a grateful nation's kind remembrance.

Every consideration of fairness and justice to our ex-soldiers, and the protection of the patriotic instinct of our citizens from perversion and violation, point to the adoption of a pension system broad and comprehensive enough to cover every contingency, and which shall make unnecessary an objectionable volume of special legislation.

As long as we adhere to the principle of granting pensions for service, and disability as the result of the service, the allowance of pensions should be restricted to cases presenting these features.

Every patriotic heart responds to a tender consideration for those who, having served their country long and well, are reduced to destitution and dependence, not as an incident of their service, but with advancing age or through sickness or misfortune. We are all tempted by the contemplation of such a condition to supply relief, and are often impatient of the limitations of public duty. Yielding to no one in the desire to indulge this feeling of consideration, I can not rid myself of the conviction that if these ex-soldiers are to be relieved they and their cause are entitled to the benefit of an enactment under which relief may be claimed as a a right, and that such relief should be granted under the sanction of law, not in evasion of it; nor should such worthy objects of care, all equally entitled, be remitted to the unequal operation of sympathy or the tender mercies of social and political influence, with their unjust discriminations.

The discharged soldiers and sailors of the country are our fellow-citizens, and interested with us in the passage and faithful execution of wholesome laws. They can not be swerved from their duty of citizenship by artful appeals to their spirit of brotherhood born of common peril and suffering, nor will they exact as a test of devotion to their welfare a willingness to neglect public duty in their behalf.

EXTRACTS FROM VETOES OF PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

In his message returning to Congress the first pension bill disapproved, that of Andrew J. Hill, vetoed for the reason that the pensioner's name was Alfred J. Hill and that the proposed bill would be inoperative, the President took occasion to say:

The policy of frequently reversing, by special enactment, the decisions of the bureau invested by law with the examination of pension claims, fully equipped for such examination, and which ought not to be suspected of any lack of liberality to our veteran soldiers, is exceedingly questionable. It may well be doubted if a committee of Congress has a better opportunity than such an agency to judge of the merits of these claims. If, however, there is any lack of power in the Pension Bureau for a full investigation it should be supplied; if the system adopted is inadequate to do full justice to claimants, it should be corrected; and if there is a want of sympathy and consideration for the defenders of our Government the bureau should be reorganized.

The disposition to concede the most generous treatment to the disabled, aged, and needy among our veterans ought not to be restrained; and it must be admitted that is some cases justice and equity can not be done nor the charitable tendencies of the Government in favor of worthy objects of its care indulged under fixed rules. These conditions sometimes justify a resort to special legislation; but I am convinced that the interposition by special enactment in the granting of pensions should be rare and exceptional. In the nature of things if this is lightly done and upon slight occasion, an invitation is offered for the presentation of claims to Congress, which upon their merits could not survive the test of an examination by the Pension Bureau, and whose only hope of success depends upon sympathy, often misdirected, instead of right and justice. The instrumentality organized by law for the determination of pension claims is thus often overruled and discredited, and there is danger that in the end popular prejudice will be created against those who are worthily entitled to the bounty of the Government.

In another case he says:

We have here presented the case of a soldier who did his duty during his Army service, and who was discharged in 1865 without any record of having suffered with rheumatism and without any claim of disability arising from the same; he returned to his place as a citizen, and in peaceful pursuits, with chances certainly not impaired by the circumstance that he had served his country, he appears to have held his place in the race of life for fifteen years or more. Then, like many another, he was subjected to loss of sight, one of the saddest afflictions known to human life.

Thereupon, and after nineteen years had elapsed since his discharge from the Army, a pension is claimed for him, upon a very shadowy allegation of the incurrence of rheumatism while in the service, coupled with the startling proposition that this rheumatism resulted, just previous to his application, in blindness. Upon medical examination it appeared that his blindness was caused by amaurosis, which is generally accepted as an affection of the optic nerve.

I am satisfied that a fair examination of the facts in this case justifies the statement that the bill under consideration can rest only upon the grounds that aid should be furnished to this ex-soldier because he served in the Army, and because he a long time thereafter became blind, disabled, and dependent.

The question is whether we are prepared to adopt this principle and establish this precedent.

None of us are entitled to credit for extreme tenderness and consideration toward those who fought their country's battles; these are sentiments common to all good citizens; they lead to the most benevolent care on the part of the Government and deeds of charity and mercy in private life. The blatant and noisy self-assertion of those who, from motives that may well be suspected, declare themselves above all others friends of the soldier, can not discredit nor belittle the calm, steady, and affectionate regard of a grateful nation.

An appropriation has just been passed setting apart $76,000,000 of the public money for distribution as pensions, under laws liberally constructed, with a view of meeting every meritorious case; more than a million of dollars was added to maintain the Pension Bureau, which is charged with the duty of a fair, just, and liberal apportionment of this fund.

Legislation has been at the present session of Congress perfected, considerably increasing the rate of pension in certain cases. Appropriations have also been made of large sums for the support of national homes where sick, disabled, or needy soldiers are cared for; and within a few days a liberal sum has been appropriated for the enlargement and increased accommodation and convenience of these institutions.

All this is no more than should be done.

But with all this, and with the hundreds of special acts which have been passed, granting pensions in cases where, for my part, I am willing to confess that sympathy rather than judgment has often led to the discovery of a relation between injury or death and military service, I am constrained by a sense of public duty to interpose against establishing a principle and setting a precedent which must result in unregulated, partial, and unjust gifts of public money under the pretext of indemnifying those who suffered in their means of support as an incident of military service.

Again he says:

In speaking of the promiscuous and ill-advised grants of pensions which have lately been presented to me for approval, I have spoken of their "apparent Congressional sanction" in recognition of the fact that a large proportion of these bills have never been submitted to a majority of either branch of Congress, but are the results of nominal sessions held for the express purpose of their consideration and attended by a small minority of the members of the respective Houses of the legislative branch of Government.

Thus, in considering these bills, I have not felt that I was aided by the deliberate judgment of the Congress; and when I have deemed it my duty to disapprove many of the bills presented, I have hardly regarded my action as a dissent from the conclusions of the people's representatives.

I have not been insensible to the suggestions which should influence every citizen, either in private station or official place, to exhibit not only a just but a generous appreciation of the services of our country's defenders. In reviewing the pension legislation presented to me, many bills have been approved upon the theory that every doubt should be resolved in favor of the proposed beneficiary. I have not, however, been able to entirely divest myself of the idea that the public money appropriated for pensions is the soldiers' fund, which should be devoted to the indemnification of those who, in the defense of the Union and in the nation's service have worthily suffered, and who, in the days of their dependence resulting from such suffering, are entitled to the benefaction of their Government.

This reflection lends to the bestowal of pensions a kind of sacredness which invites the adoption of such principles and regulations as will exclude perversion as well as insure a liberal and generous application of grateful and benevolent designs. Heedlessness and a disregard of the principle which underlies the granting of pensions is unfair to the wounded, crippled soldier who is honored in the just recognition of his Government. Such a man should never find himself side by side on the pension-roll with those who have been tempted to attribute the natural ills to which humanity is heir to service in the Army. Every relaxation of principle in the granting of pensions invites applications without merit and encourages those who for gain urge honest men to become dishonest. Thus is the demoralizing lesson taught the people, that as against the public Treasury the most questionable expedients are allowable.

In another case he says:

I can not spell out any principle upon which the bounty of the Government is bestowed through the instrumentality of the flood of private pension bills that reach me. The theory seems to have been adopted that no man who served in the Army can be the subject of death or impaired health except they are chargeable to his service. Medical theories are set at naught and the most startling relation is claimed between alleged incidents of military service and disability or death. Fatal apoplexy is admitted as the result of quite insignificant wounds, heart disease is attributed to chronic diarrhea, consumption to hernia, and suicide is traced to army service in a wonderfully devious and curious way.

Adjudications of the Pension Bureau are overruled in the most peremptory fashion by these special acts of Congress, since nearly all the beneficiaries named in these bills have unsuccessfully applied to that bureau for relief.

This course of special legislation operates very unfairly.

Those with certain influence or friends to push their claims procure pensions, and those who have neither friends nor influence must be content with their fate under general laws. It operates unfairly by increasing in numerous instances the pensions of those already on the rolls, while many other more deserving cases from the lack of fortunate advocacy are obliged to be content with the sum provided by general laws.

The apprehension may well be entertained that the freedom with which these private pension bills are passed furnishes an inducement to fraud and imposition, while it certainly teaches the vicious lesson to our people that the Treasury of the national Government invites the approach of private need.

None of us should be in the least wanting in regard for the veteran soldier, and I will yield to no man in a desire to see those who defended the Government when it needed defenders liberally treated. Unfriendliness to our veterans is a charge easily and sometimes dishonestly made.

I insist that the true soldier is a good citizen, and that he will be satisfied with generous, fair, and equal consideration for those who are worthily entitled to help.

I have considered the pension list of the Republic a roll of honor bearing names inscribed by national gratitude and not by improvident and indiscriminate alms-giving.

I have conceived the prevention of the complete discredit which must ensue from the unreasonable, unfair, and reckless granting of pensions by special acts to be the best service I can render our veterans.

In the discharge of what has seemed to me my duty as related to legislation and in the interest of all the veterans of the Union Army, I have attempted to stem the tide of improvident pension enactments, though I confess to a full share of responsibility for some of these laws that should not have been passed.

I am far from denying that there are cases of merit which can not be reached except by special enactment; but I do not believe there is a member of either House of Congress who will not admit that this kind of legislation has been carried too far.

My aim has been at all times, in dealing with bills of this character, to give the applicant for a pension the benefit of any doubt that might arise and which balanced the propriety of granting a pension, if there seemed any just foundation for the application; but when it seemed entirely outside of every rule, in its nature or the proof supporting it, I have supposed I only did my duty in interposing an objection.

It seems to me that it would be well if our general pension laws should be revised with a view of meeting every meritorious case that can arise. Our experience and knowledge of any existing deficiencies ought to make the enactment of a complete pension code possible.

In the absence of such a revision and if pensions are to be granted upon equitable grounds and without regard to general laws, the present methods would be greatly improved by the establishment of some tribunal to examine the facts in every case and determine upon the merits of the application.

Other extracts are as follows:

If such speculations and presumptions as this are to be indulged, we shall find ourselves surrounded and hedged in by the rule that all men entering an army were free from disease or the liability to disease before their enlistment, and every infirmity which is visited upon them thereafter is the consequence of army service.

* * * * * * *

Before the passage of the bill herewith returned, the Commissioner of Pensions, in ignorance of the action of Congress, allowed his claim under the general law. As this decision of the Pension Bureau entitles the beneficiary named to draw a pension from the date of filing his application, which, under the provisions of the special bill in his favor, would only accrue from the time of its passage, I am unwilling that one found worthy to be placed upon the pension-rolls by the Bureau to which he properly applied should be an actual loser by reason of a special interposition of Congress in his behalf.

* * * * * * *

I am by no means insensible to that influence which leads the judgment toward the allowance of every claim alleged to be founded upon patriotic service in the nation's cause. And yet I neither believe it to be a duty nor a kindness to the worthy citizens for whose benefit our scheme of pensions was provided, to permit the diversion of the nation's bounty to objects not within its scope and purpose.

It is not a pleasant thing to interfere in such a case. But we are dealing with pensions and not with gratuities.

* * * * * * *

I believe her case to be a pitiable one and wish that I could join in her relief. But unfortunately official duty can not always be well done when directed solely by sympathy and charity.

* * * * * * *

A disabled man and wife and family in need are objects which appeal to the sympathy and charitable feelings of any decent man, but it seems to me that it by no means follows that those intrusted with the people's business and the expenditure of the people's money are justified in so executing the pension laws as that they shall furnish a means of relief in every case of distress or hardship.

THE ONLY "REBEL PENSION" BILL PRESENTED VETOED BY CLEVELAND.

After his capture he joined the Confederate forces and in 1865 was captured by General Stoneman while in arms against the United States Government. He was imprisoned and voluntarily made known the fact that he formerly belonged to the Union Army. Upon taking the oath of allegiance and explaining that he deserted to the enemy to escape the hardship and starvation of prison life, he was released and mustered out of the service on the 11th day of October, 1865.

He was regularly borne on the Confederate muster-rolls for probably nine or ten months. No record is furnished of the number of battles in which he fought against the soldiers of the Union, and we shall never know the death and the wounds which he inflicted upon his former comrades in arms.

He never applied for a pension, though it is claimed now that at the time of his discharge he was suffering from rheumatism and dropsy, and that he died in 1868 of heart disease. If such disabilities were incurred in military service they were quite likely the result of exposure in the Confederate army; but it is not improbable that this soldier never asked a pension because he considered that the generosity of his Government had been sufficiently taxed when the full forfeit of his desertion was not exacted.

The greatest possible sympathy and consideration are due to those who bravely fought, and being captured as bravely languished in rebel prisons.

But I will take no part in putting a name upon our pension-roll which represents a Union soldier found fighting against the cause he swore he would uphold; nor should it be for a moment admitted that such desertion and treachery are excused when it avoids the rigors of honorable capture and confinement.

It would have been a sad condition of affairs if every captured Union soldier had deemed himself justified in fighting against his Government rather than to undergo the privations of capture.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, and I have no doubt that the gentleman in charge of the bill will readily accede to it, that our side of the House be granted some time to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. McKINNEY. I was replying to a gentleman on that side of the House, the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire occupied thirteen minutes additional time at the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I thought it was more than that. I thought it was at least twenty.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask that our side be granted thirty minutes.

Mr. SPINOLA. Say thirty minutes on each side.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Well, if the gentleman wants time on that side, let us say forty on each side.

Mr. SPINOLA. Very well; we might just as well devote the balance of the day to this discussion and make it a field day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from Iowa to the committee.

Is there objection to allowing forty minutes on each side?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I object.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then I renew my former request for thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I object to that, and demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time will it take to make an equal division of the time?

The CHAIRMAN. It would require about fifteen minutes on the left of the Chair to equalize the time used by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that fifteen minutes at least be allowed to gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. In deference to what seems to be the wishes of the committee, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BURNES. I trust my friend from Iowa will be allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not asking it for myself, but for our side of the House.

Mr. BURNES. How much time will the gentleman want for himself?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not know that I shall occupy any time myself.

Mr. BURNES. Let us give the gentleman thirty minutes to be occupied as he sees proper.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNES. If it is understood that we are then to stop this electioneering business and proceed with the regular order in the House, I think there will be no objection by any one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now I yield that time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. McKINNEY] in all his line—I will not say of argument, but of oration. I wish to traverse a single field, and that will be the field of pension legislation. The mission of the gentleman from New Hampshire has been to attempt to prove that the Democratic party is entitled to the credit of the increased number of pension certificates issued within the past three years, and that the present Democratic Administration has therefore been a better friend of the soldier than the Republican administrations preceding. That is the position I shall attempt to traverse. And I now lay down this primary proposition, that every man, woman and child borne upon the pension-rolls of the United States to-day is there by virtue of the action of the Republican party or the representatives of that party, except those who have been restored to the roll after having been dropped therefrom for participation in rebellion against the Government. [Applause.] That is my first proposition.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] printed in the RECORD on last Sunday a well-considered and elaborate speech, in which he made the following statement:

Let me suggest that whatever defects there may be in the pension laws are the legacies of Republican rule. NO PARTY DURING OR SINCE THE CIVIL WAR HAS HAD THE POWER TO ENACT ANY LAW EXCEPT THE REPUBLICAN PARTY. From the 4th of March, 1861, to the 4th of March, 1875, there was undisputed sway; and again from the 4th of March, 1881, to the 4th of March, 1883, there was a Republican majority in both branches of Congress and a Republican President was in the executive chair.

If "no party during or since the war has had power to enact any law except the Republican party," then surely the credit of all pension laws which have been enacted belongs to the Republican party.

It is true that up to 1874, when the Revised Statutes were compiled, there was not a word in the law, not a section nor a statute, relating to the subject of pensions that had not been put there by the Republican party, and with the single exception that I have named, and there is not now a single section that has been placed there except by their action.

Admittedly down to March 4, 1875, when the Democratic party returned to power in this House, the credit of all pension legislation which existed belonged to the Republican party.

Mr. Chairman, how does it stand since that date? I affirm that every important item of pension legislation since that date were either Republican measures or owed their enactment to Republican votes. I have myself examined the record and here give the result:

In order that these votes may be more readily referred to, I here append them in tabulated form.

It will be noted, first, that only in one case (that of the widows' increase bill) were there more Democrats voted for than against any bill; second, that in all these votes there was but one Republican vote against one of them, and that was from the State of Florida. This table, taken from the official record, ought to settle now and forever the attitude of the Democratic party toward pension legislation:

Tabulated statement of votes on pension bills.

Name of bill.	Democrats for.	Democrats against.	Republicans for.	Republicans against.
Repeal of arrears limitation, Forty-sixth Congress	48	61	116	0
Mexican pension bill, with Senate amendments, Forty-eighth Congress, first session	39	84	87	0
Mexican pension bill, with Senate amendments, Forty-eighth Congress, second session	57	84	72	1
Widows' increase, Forty-ninth Congress	80	66	118	0
"Senate bill, 1886," Forty-ninth Congress (never reported back in the House)	7	14	27	0
Dependent-pension bill, Forty-ninth Congress	66	76	114	0
Dependent-pension bill, Forty-ninth Congress (to pass over President's veto)	37	125	138	0
On all the bills (aggregate)	334	510	572	1

That table, Mr. Chairman, is worth more than any of the gentleman's flights of rhetoric. It shows that not one of all those bills could have passed upon the Democratic vote. This table is the barbed spear that will impale the claims of the Democratic party. It is like the "damned spot" on Lady Macbeth's hand. "All the perfumes of Arabia" can not sweeten it.

But the gentleman referred to the great increase of pension certificates in the last three years over the number issued in the previous three years. These tables are all printed by Colonel MATSON in his speech. It appears, according to these tables, that this excess of certificates issued numbers 168,231. Where does that excess come from? It is shown in a communication, also included in Colonel MATSON'S speech as an exhibit, namely: The excess arises from the act of March 9, 1886, increasing pensions of widows, orphans, and dependents; from the act of August 4, 1886, increasing pensions to crippled soldiers or amputation cases, and the act of January 29, 1887, known as the Mexican pension bill, and the act of June 7, 1888, giving arrears to widows.

Under these first three acts there have been issued 133,364 new and additional certificates. Of these 112,660 were under the two acts first named. This was merely the mechanical operation of withdrawing the old and issuing the new certificate, the old certificate being the only proof required.

Now, my inquiry is, Mr. Chairman, who is entitled to the credit of these three acts? To whom is due the legislation which produced the increase? Down to 1874 unquestionably the Republican party is entitled to the credit of every pension law. I maintain that since that time, with the single exception which I have before named, they are entitled to the credit of the pension legislation by virtue of which this increase of pension certificates has occurred. The first statute referred to by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY], and also by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], is the act approved March 19, 1886, granting an increase of pension to widows, minors, and dependents.

I do not know how many gentlemen introduced bills in that Congress for that purpose in the House. I know, for one, I did; I know it went to the Pensions Committee and a bill was reported back; I know also that it passed this House, and by what vote did it pass the House? I find, by reference to the RECORD, that it was passed under a suspension of the rules on the 1st of February, 1887. I find that upon the vote 80 Democrats voted for the bill and 66 Democrats voted against the bill, and as two-thirds was required under the rules to pass it, by the Democratic vote alone it would have been defeated. I find that 118 Republicans voted for the bill, and I find that not one single Republican voted against it. [Applause.]

The Republican party in this House passed that law, and it could not have been passed at the time it was passed except by the Republican vote. Sixty-six Democrats voting against the widows' bill would have defeated it, if it had depended upon the Democratic vote, by a very considerable majority. I therefore claim that credit for the "widows' increase pension bill," and of the 102,568 certificates issued under it, is due to the Republican party of this side of the House, because it would have been defeated by the vote of the sixty-six gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Now what are the facts in regard to the next act to which the gentleman refers; an act for which he claims the credit for the Democrats; the act approved August 4, 1886, increasing the pension of men who have lost an arm or a leg, sometimes called the amputation bill. I introduced a bill of that kind in the Forty-eighth Congress, in pursuance of the petition of the Grand Army of the Republic, and I introduced it again in the Forty-ninth Congress. I do not know what other gentlemen introduced similar bills, but I do know that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] did. It was not my particular number that was reported back.

I think it was Mr. MATSON'S or Mr. HENDERSON'S bill that was reported back, and that came before the House. What was the vote? (That is House bill 2056, first session of the Forty-ninth Congress.) It passed the House of Representatives without division; it went to the Senate and was there amended and the rates increased. It came back to the House. On June 28, 1886, for the first time, I asked consideration of that bill by unanimous consent. Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, objected, and it was not then considered, but later on, August 2, 1886, Colonel MATSON, as chairman of the committee moved, under suspension of the rules, to take up the bill and pass it, and it was taken up and passed by the following vote: Yeas 166, nays 51, divided as follows: Democrats voting for the bill 75, Democrats voting against the bill 51; Republicans voting for the bill 91, Republicans voting against the bill—not one. [Applause.] And so it was passed by Republican votes. Had it been left to the Democratic vote under the suspension of the rules, the bill would have been defeated by more than 25.

Under that bill there have been issued additional certificates to the number of 10,092; and I claim this issue of certificates to the credit of the Republicans on this side of the House.

What is the next bill to which the gentleman refers and claims credit for the Democratic side? It is what is called the Mexican pension bill. Well, now, perhaps neither side can claim any very great credit for the passage of that bill; but I desire to state the true history of the Mexican pension bill. It was introduced in this House by General Frank Woolford, of Kentucky, a most excellent and patriotic gentleman. It was a very simple measure when it was introduced. It provided that any man who had ever had his name on the army-roll of the Mexican war for a single day during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, or 1848, even if he had not been within a thousand miles of Mexico, should have a pension for life at $8 a month without any limitation of service, disability, age, dependence, or anything else.

That bill in that form came before this House, and I, for one, opposed it with whatever ability I had. I regarded it as a legislative monstrosity; but it passed the House in that form by a vote as follows: Democrats for the bill, 123; Democrats against the bill, 12. Republicans for the bill, 33; Republicans against the bill, 56—a majority of 111 Democrats for the bill and a majority of 23 Republicans against it. That bill went to the Senate, and the Senate struck out everything after the enacting clause and put a decent bill in its place.

I here incorporate in my remarks precisely what took place in the Senate:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being withdrawn, the bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, in line 4, section 1, after the words "that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to," to strike out the following words:

"Place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"Place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including marines, militia, and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States, who, being duly enlisted, actually served sixty days with the Army or Navy of the United States in Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, in the war with that nation, or were actually engaged in a battle in said war, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said war, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried: Provided, That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become sixty-two years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency equivalent to some cause prescribed or recognized by the pension laws of the United States as a sufficient reason for the allowance of a pension, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act; but it shall not be held to include any person not within the rule of age or disability or dependency herein defined, or who incurred such disability while in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aiding or abetting the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That pensions under section 1 of this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, and payable only from and after the passage of this act, for and during the natural lives of the persons entitled thereto, or during the continuance of the disability for which the same shall be granted: Provided, That section 1 of this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month.

"SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed on the pension-roll under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, of the right of the applicant to a pension; and any person who shall falsely and corruptly take any oath required under this act shall be deemed guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the pension-roll the name of any person whenever it shall be made to appear by proof satisfactory to him that such name was put upon such roll through false and fraudulent representations, and that such person is not entitled to a pension under this act. The loss of the certificate of discharge shall not deprive any person of the benefits of this act, but other record evidence of enlistment and service and of an honorable discharge may be deemed sufficient: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land-warrant, under any act of Congress, for and on account of service in the said war with Mexico, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land-warrant was improperly granted.

"SEC. 4. That the pension laws now in force which are not inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby made a part of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto.

"SEC. 5. That section 4716 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as the same relates to this act or to pensioners under this act.

"SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. CONGER. What is the section repealed?

Mr. BLAIR. The section repealed is this:

"SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States."

That is repealed, but the act contains a provision that no person shall be pensioned whose disability was contracted in opposition to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Is that repealed absolutely, or only so far as it affects this act? Let that clause be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The repealing clause will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read section 5 of the amendment of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

That bill came back here—not the bill that went from this House, but the Senate bill—and it passed the House by a vote of 247 yeas to 5 nays; the nays being three Democrats and two Republicans. The vote was non-partisan, and therefore I say that neither side can claim the exclusive credit.

But I claim that the Mexican pension bill, as it became a law, was strictly a Senate bill, was a Republican measure, and was altogether different in character from the Democratic measure that originally passed the House. Under that law there had been issued 21,704 additional certificates up to the time when the Commissioner made this report. That gives, under these three acts, 133,364 additional certificates out of the 168,000 additional certificates which the gentleman claims should be credited to the Democratic party, and which I claim should of right be credited to the Republican party.

This accounts for the vast majority of the increases. As for the rest, the present Commissioner ought to have turned out more. It will be observed by reference to the tables printed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], which are the same used by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY], that of the whole number of certificates issued by Commissioner Black in three years, 181,173 were increases of pensions which had been granted by Republican Commissioners, and in which for the most part there was nothing but an examination by a board and a new certificate or the merely mechanical operation of withdrawing the old and issuing the new certificate.

Not only that, but Commissioner Black had at his hand the accumulated material of more than twenty years, an increased force of examiners and experts, and instead of having his bureau scattered in detached and ill-adapted buildings, as Commissioner Dudley did, he has had the most commodious and the most convenient building for the dispatch of business that the Government has ever possessed in this capital. I could not detract from the credit justly due General Black. But he has only been administering Republican laws, and he is in full sympathy with the Republicans in the matter of pensions. And just here I desire to call attention to the difference between the making and the administering of law. General Black is an efficient administrator of the law. But the law itself confers the right to the pension, not the Commissioner. Those who made the law and conferred the right are entitled to the credit for the increase.

There is still another law the credit of which is claimed for the Democratic party, the "widows' arrears act," which passed at the present session of Congress, and was approved June 7, 1888. Let us look at that for a moment and see where the credit of it belongs. I have searched the RECORD in vain to find whether any other gentleman introduced a widows' arrears bill; that is, a bill to date the pensions of widows back to the death of their husbands. I know that I did introduce such a bill, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MORRILL] introduced a bill declaratory of the existing law. Those two bills went to the committee and were never reported back; but upon the pension appropriation bill my Republican friend from Iowa, Mr. CONGER, moved an amendment almost in the terms of the bill I had introduced, giving arrears to widows from the date of the death of their husbands.

The chairman of the subcommittee in charge of that bill, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN, Democrat], raised a point of order against the amendment, but the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, Democrat] overruled the point of order, and the amendment was adopted without a division. The bill with that amendment went to the Senate. There it was debated at great length. There a motion was made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to strike out all words that would apply to widows whose pensions had been theretofore allowed, namely, the words "which have been or." This would have cut off all widows whose pensions have been allowed from July 1, 1880, to this date, about 10,000. A division was had, and the vote was as follows: For striking out, 20—every man a Democrat. Against striking out, 23, of whom 22 were Republicans, and 1 Democrat. All honor to that lone Democrat!

So the amendment of Mr. CONGER was concurred in by the Senate and became a law, and ten thousand widows may thank a Republican of the House and the Republican Senate for their arrears. That amendment was Republican in its origin, was introduced here by a Republican, and the point of order against it was made by the Democratic chairman of the subcommittee; it went to the Senate and there it was retained in the bill by a strict party vote, except one, the Republicans voting in favor of it and the Democrats against it.

I have now gone over all the new pension legislation the credit of which is claimed by the gentleman from New Hampshire for the Democratic party, and I have undertaken to show that every one of these measures, the widows' increase bill, the amputation bill, the Mexican pension bill, and the widows' arrears bill, every one of them, was passed by Republican votes, and would not have passed if left to the Democratic side. Such is the fostering care of the Democratic party of the soldiers of the country and of the soldiers' widows.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words in regard to another subject which the gentleman from New Hampshire has discussed.

As I said awhile ago, I can not follow him in his flight. I do not dare attempt it, for in his oratory he swept through the firmament like a comet, from horizon to horizon, paling the stars and the planets as he passed with the brilliancy of his electric flashes. [Laughter.] I can not undertake to follow him, but I want to say a few words in regard to the vetoes. The gentleman tells us that the present President of the United States has signed more private pension bills than any other President has ever signed; but he does not tell us how many such bills the President has vetoed, nor what is the proportion between the number of his vetoes and the number of the vetoes of other Presidents.

I claim that the issue is not how many bills a President signs. That is not the test of his friendliness to the legislation. The test is, what proportion of the bills sent to him does he treat in a friendly manner? I undertake to say that President Cleveland has vetoed more pension bills than all the Presidents of the United States from George Washington down. Not only that, but he has vetoed twenty-five times as many as all the other Presidents of the United States from Washington down. In the Forty-ninth Congress there were sent to President Cleveland for his action 949 pension acts. Of those 949 he vetoed 124; he disapproved but allowed to become law without his signature 156, and 55 he failed to sign, which failed for want of his signature; making a total of 281 out of the 749 presented to him that he failed to approve.

I have recently had occasion to investigate this matter, and I here give the result of that investigation. The account stands thus:

Grant approved 575, disapproved 8; Hayes approved 307, disapproved NONE; Arthur approved 736, disapproved NONE. All three approved 1,614, disapproved 8. Or three Republican Presidents disapproved 1 in 202.

But 5 of the 8 vetoed by General Grant were vetoed for the benefit of the claimants, and making that deduction it would leave but three vetoes or 1 in 538.

Now, how stands it with President Cleveland? During the first two years of his administration Congress sent to him for approval 949 acts. The Constitution (Article I, section 7, clause 2) directs that "If he (the President) approve (an act) he shall sign it." Therefore if he does not sign he does not approve.

Of these 949 acts President Cleveland—

Vetoed and returned	124
Disapproved without returning	156
Pocketed and defeated	1
Total disapproved	281
Approved and signed	668

Or he disapproved 1 act for every 2.37 that he approved, or nearly 1 in 3. Republican vetoes, 1 in 202; Democratic vetoes, 1 in 2.37. So much for this piece of Democratic special pleading. According to the statement of his champion [Mr. MCKINNEY], the President has to date signed 1,264 bills, and has failed to sign 410, or almost exactly 1 in 3.

During the twenty-four years of Republican administration, extending from Lincoln to Arthur, inclusive, there were but 8 vetoes of pension bills—all by President Grant—5 of which were in the interest of the beneficiaries of the bills.

In three sessions of Cleveland's administration the pension vetoes already number 199, without counting the 156 disapprovals where the bills were allowed to become law without the President's signature; failed for want of signature 55. Therefore we make this comparison:

Vetoes of pension bills in twenty-four Republican years, 8, or 1 in three years.

Vetoes of pension bills in three Democratic years, 199—199 in three years, or, counting the failures to sign, 410 in three years.

The gentleman says that General Grant vetoed some pension bills. General Grant, during the eight years of his administration, vetoed 8 pension bills only. Five of those were, as I have before said, vetoed in the interest of the beneficiaries because they had already been allowed at the Pension Office a better stipend than they could obtain by the bills. Three he vetoed because the proposed beneficiaries were deserters from the service.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How many pension bills were passed during the first four years of General Grant's administration, and how many have been passed during Mr. Cleveland's administration?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I can answer that in a few moments. I believe it is stated by the Department that during the first term of General Grant's administration 321 special acts were approved; during his second term 254. During the first Congress of President Cleveland's administration there were sent to him 949 private pension bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How many did he approve?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Of these he approved 668. But, Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the gentleman, it seems to me that is a very narrow device. The President has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the number of pension bills sent to him. That is a matter for Congress exclusively; and during a part of General Grant's administration, as the gentleman well knows, the Democratic party was in power in one branch of Congress and controlled absolutely the number of pension bills sent to him. The question is not how many did they approve, but how many did they refuse to approve. In eight years

Grant refused to approve 8. In two years Cleveland refused to approve 281. That is the test.

My point, Mr. Chairman, is just this, that the President has absolutey nothing to do with the number of pension bills sent to him. The only question is, how does he treat them when they come to him? Does he treat them in a friendly or an unfriendly way? I am justified in saying that the general course of treatment of President Cleveland toward pension bills sent to him has been unfriendly. He has already vetoed more than 199 pension bills, besides the 156 he disapproved without vetoing them. At one fell swoop he struck down the dependent pension bill, which would have benefited thousands and tens of thousands of needy veterans who were suffering in the almshouses of the country. His course as a whole has been adverse to pension legislation. I will say nothing here of the undignified and unbecoming language in which many of the vetoes were couched. I will give him credit for having improved in that respect.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter on which I wish to speak for a moment, and then I shall yield the floor to other gentlemen. I want to make a brief allusion to what the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] said about the order for the return of what are called the "rebel flags." The gentleman says that no flag was ever returned under the order of President Cleveland, and that therefore the President is to be held up as an example of patriotism and virtue. But, Mr. Chairman, I have this to say, that it is nothing to the credit of the President, who made the order, that the flags were not returned. It was the voice of the great loyal North and Northwest that came thundering down upon him like a cyclone that stopped the order and turned it back. [Applause.]

The following is the substance of General Drum's letter to the Secretary of War:

* * * * * * *

While in the past favorable action has always been taken on application, properly supported, for the return of Union flags to organizations representing survivors of the military regiments in the service of the Government, I beg to submit that it would be a graceful act to anticipate future requests of this nature, and venture to suggest the propriety of returning all the flags (Union and Confederate) to the authorities of the respective States in which the regiments which bore those colors were organized, for such final disposition as they may determine.

* * * * * * *

Impressed with these facts, I have the honor to submit the suggestion made in this letter for the careful consideration it will receive at your hands.

Very truly, yours,

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

The indorsement of the Secretary upon this letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 26, 1887.

The within recommendation IS APPROVED BY THE PRESIDENT, and the Adjutant-General will prepare letters to governors of those States whose troops carried their colors and flags now in this Department, with the offer to return them as herein proposed, the history of each flag and the circumstances of its capture or recapture to be given.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

So President Cleveland did approve the order, but when he discovered that he had made a grave mistake he prudently retreated.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to be distinctly understood. This is a matter for the President only. I do not know and I never heard that anybody in the late Confederacy (if I may use that expression) ever asked for the return of those flags. Those flags were bravely defended with life and blood, and with courage equal to that exhibited in any struggle; and when the flags went down the great body of those who had fought under them in the Confederate army accepted the situation, and they never asked for the return of those flags. They recognized the fact that the flags were the symbols of their cause, and when the cause was lost the flags went with the cause.

What would they do with them if they had them? Mr. Chairman, a flag means something. That flag over your head means something. It means something to me and to my comrades who followed it upon many a bloody field. It means country, it means Constitution, it means liberty, it means law, it means all the thronging future with its momentous possibilities. [Applause.]

It means homes and firesides; it means our children, and it means our kindred and our posterity that shall come after us down to the latest generations. That is what we fought for. [Applause.] That is what our comrades died for. It may be that the President did not realize this. It has never been burned into him in battle fires as it has been into some.

What did the other flag mean? You men who bore it bravely, you know what it meant. It meant the doctrine of the right of secession, and you yourselves now say that the doctrine of secession is dead. It meant the dissolution of this magnificent Union, and you yourselves say now that this is a grand, magnificent, indissoluble Union of indestructible States. [Applause.] It meant war against the Constitution of your country. Does it mean that to you now? If you had received the flags, moth-eaten, tattered, torn, battle-rent as they are, what would you have done with them?

No, my friends; no, my brothers; I speak with malice to no one, with charity to all; it is better that they should rot and be moth-eaten in the attics of the War Department than that they should ever be returned to the hands that bravely bore them on the battle-field. Out of the tomb of the lost cause they will bring neither light nor glory nor honor. Let them rest. They no longer mean what they meant then; they can never mean it again, and God helping us we never intend that the symbols of disunion, secession, and war against the Constitution shall ever again go back into the hands that bore them on the battle-fields of the rebellion. [Loud applause.]

I now yield what time is remaining to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], if he desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As I do not see the gentleman from Maine in his seat, I will yield it back to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will reserve the remainder of the time, unless the gentleman from Maine, whom I now see in the Hall, desires to occupy it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no use for the six minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Then I shall reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to offer an amendment before leaving this part of the bill.

Page 50, lines 11 and 12, strike out "Horenburg" and insert "Hovenburg."
Also, on page 59, line 9, insert "Harry H. Bodwell, $1,459.54; Edward T. Strong, $111.20; C. Mark Cole, $4,097."
And in lines 20 and 21 strike out "$46,239.31" and insert "$51,837.05."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of United States courts, 1879 and prior years, $128.04.

Mr. MORROW. I offer an amendment to come in after line 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 59, after line 14, by inserting the following:
"For balance of fees of A. L. Rhodes as assistant United States attorney in the cases of the San Francisco Savings and Trust Society vs. Irwin and Boulden vs. Phelps, involving title of Mare Island, California, including the navy-yard, $4,000."

Mr. BURNES. I make the point of order against that amendment; that is not germane in the first place, and then that it is an expenditure unauthorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MORROW. In reply to the point of order, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri and the Chair to a note appended to page 5 of the document I hold in my hand, which is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental list of claims allowed by accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, embodied in Executive Document No. 377, of this session of Congress. The account is set forth there as the account of "A. L. Rhodes, special assistant United States attorney; fees of district attorneys of United States courts, 1887, and prior years," to which is appended this note:

NOTE.—The Attorney-General, on February 24, 1888, approved an account for $4,000 in favor of Mr. Rhodes as special assistant United States attorney, apportioning it among fiscal years as follows: $1,000 payable from appropriation for 1885; $1,000 payable from appropriation for 1886, and $2,000 payable from appropriation for 1887. The appropriation for each of those years being exhausted, the First Auditor reported the whole account to this office disallowed, basing his action on section 3679, Revised Statutes.

This office, though regarding the action taken by the Auditor as correct under section 3679, Revised Statutes, has not certified the account, but has chosen thus to bring the matter to the attention of Congress, in order that an appropriation may be made to pay it, if Congress so desires.

Now, it may possibly be that under a strict construction of that particular section of the law to which reference is made (section 3679 of the Revised Statutes), which restricts the appropriations for contracts where the money is not in the Treasury to pay the contracts, that the amendment would be inadmissible; but I desire to say that the most that can be claimed against this amendment is that the aggregate of the expenditure under that particular head was in excess of the amount appropriated, though it did not follow that this particular contract was in itself in excess of that amount, so that when you come to the final adjudication of these particular accounts, and the contracts were found to be in excess of the amounts appropriated, this strictly might fall under that rule. But I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not insist upon the point of order if the Chairman shall determine the point as well taken, but will allow this claim, the character of which I am satisfied no one will dispute, to be considered on its merits, and let the committee decide the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri to make the point of order that the appropriation is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. BURNES. It is right in the face of the existing law, and the gentleman will so concede.

Mr. MORROW. All I concede is that the appropriations for that year were deficient and that the contracts were made, and necessarily made in excess of the appropriations.

But, if the Chair will permit me, I want to appeal to the gentleman from Missouri not to insist upon the point of order. This was a contract made with one of our leading attorneys in California, who discharged the duties most efficiently and faithfully——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman had better get the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, since he makes his appeal to him.

Mr. MORROW. I am now appealing to allow this to go in, and I am stating these reasons: The Attorney-General made this contract with Mr. Rhodes (ex-chief-justice) to perform these services. It was to defend the title to Mare Island, an exceedingly valuable property of the United States. It is admitted that the contract for the services was exceedingly moderate, and that Judge Rhodes has performed, even for the compensation here proposed, services that were very valuable. The result of his services has been to save the title of this property to the United States. Now, here is a contract made by an officer of the United States who had authority to make the contract; the services have been performed; there is nothing remaining to be done on the part of the attorney; and the compensation ought therefore to be paid.

Mr. BURNES. In so far as the gentleman appeals to me, I yield to that appeal; but he can not appeal to me successfully in this case as a representative of the rules. Therefore I am compelled to insist upon the point of order, as the admission of this amendment would be a direct and palpable violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. MCKENNA. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it within the competency of the Attorney-General of the United States to employ special counsel in a case? If it is, and he does so, then certainly to make appropriation to pay for those services would be within existing law.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to call attention to a case which arose on this very bill the other day, in which it was stated that the Attorney-General had power under the law to employ special counsel and permission was given to put an appropriation upon this bill for a case exactly like this.

Mr. MCKENNA. In a matter of this kind, if there be any doubt, I think the doubt ought to be resolved as against the point of order. The suit in which these services were rendered involved the swamp and overflowed land on Mare Island. That suit was decided against the Government and is now before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. The other case involved the yard itself. And surely, Mr. Chairman, under such circumstances as this, the fee being small and the counsel employed having performed the services, if there be any doubt, it should be resolved against the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. During a discussion the other day upon an amendment offered by myself to put upon this bill an additional $30,000 to enable the Attorney-General to pay attorneys for services they had already rendered, together with those which are likely to become necessary during the current year, the question was put to me by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], who is not now present, as to whether or not there were any cases of the character now presented by the gentleman from California. At that time I had made no inquiry into that matter whatever; but I have since gone to the Treasury Department and made inquiries to ascertain whether there were cases of the description just mentioned. I find that there was not only this particular case which the gentleman from California has presented, but another case where the Attorney-General had employed counsel under the direction of Congress, or rather had employed counsel in pursuance of law, to look into the title to the Potomac flats; and no doubt there are others, though I did not ask how many there were; neither did I investigate into this matter at all. These services are rendered in pursuance of law, and the gentleman from California is entirely correct in stating (and I can turn to the statute in an instant if necessary) that the Attorney-General has power to employ these parties.

There are certain restrictions upon the employment, such as that employment must be made before the work is performed; but that the power exists there is no question. The amendment I sought to put on this bill was to enable the Attorney-General to discharge these liabilities incurred under the law. It was voted down, improperly voted down in my judgment. Every case of that description stands upon precisely the same basis as the case now presented by the gentleman from California. Services of this description now remain unpaid, and yet no provision has been made on the part of the Government in the sundry civil bill or in this bill for the payment for these meritorious services.

I remarked at the time when the amendment was presented that there was a misapprehension of this matter, because I think the House had in mind the case of Mr. Lowrey's fees in New York, and refused to make the appropriation on that account. I want to state that I learn from my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who I believe is now present, that Solicitor General Jenks, who alone of the officers of the Department of Justice has had anything to do in the way of employing counsel connected with the Bell telephone case, says that he does not intend to pay Mr. Lowrey any more of the fee he claims against the Government.

Now, what the House ought to do, and what the committee ought to do, is to pass the amendment which I offered the other day and appropriate $30,000 in this deficiency bill to enable the Department of Justice to do that which Congress has called upon it to do. This amendment as offered I have not a shadow of doubt ought to be adopted. The employment of special attorneys is a matter left to the discretion of the Attorney-General, and is imposed upon him as a matter of public duty.

Mr. MORROW. I think under the authority of the Attorney-General, conferred upon him by law, he is to employ counsel, and that it is in order on this bill to appropriate money for the payment of services rendered under that employment. Now, this is a case where the Attorney-General did employ counsel in an emergency. A suit was brought in which valuable services were rendered. He had to employ an exceedingly able lawyer, who has rendered faithful service, and the Government has been benefited thereby. Now, the question is, will this House pay this lawyer for the service he rendered in accordance with the contract which the Attorney-General was authorized to make under the law?

Mr. BURNES. I agree largely with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] as to the propriety of paying these claims. They are like a thousand other meritorious claims pending before Congress for which some provision ought to be made. I call the attention of the Chair to section 3679 of the General Statutes, which reads:

No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of that appropriation.

Now, I am satisfied with my friend from Arkansas that the interests of the Government demand that liberal appropriations should be made for the employment of general counsel, and able general counsel in many cases; but that is not the question before us now; we will reach that at some other stage.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair will be compelled to hold that it is well taken.

Mr. MORROW. It seems that the other day this very question was raised by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who called attention to section 363 of the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, but if the gentleman chooses he can take the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MORROW. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to section 363 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counsel the amount of their compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. But that section is qualified by the other section, which restricts the Attorney-General to the amount of the appropriation for the fiscal year.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] does not seem to understand. But while the Attorney-General has the power to employ counsel in cases like this, yet in making contracts for the employment of counsel he is limited by the amount of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the statement which the Chair has just made, and if the sections read are the only sections of the law bearing upon the subject, the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MCKENNA. But, Mr. Chairman, it does not appear here that when this contract was made it was in excess of the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact that there is a deficiency would seem to indicate that it was.

Mr. MCKENNA. No, sir; because it may be that the money was disbursed in other ways after the contract was made and before the time of payment.

The CHAIRMAN. That might possibly prove to be true upon investigation, but it does not affect the point of order.

Mr. MCKENNA. Well, if the contract was within the law when it was made, it is not put outside of the law by the subsequent expenditure of the moneys for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. But the point the gentleman raises involves a question of fact, not a point of order. The presumption is that this is beyond the appropriation, or else this deficiency would not be asked for. The section of the law which the gentleman has read authorizes the Attorney-General to employ, but the other section which has been read by the gentleman in charge of the bill limits the employment within certain bounds fixed by the appropriation.

Mr. MCKENNA. Would not that ruling make the whole deficiency bill out of order, because manifestly there have been deficient appropriations or there would be no necessity for further appropriations now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would make out of order everything sustaining a relation to this bill like that sustained by this particular item. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Claims allowed by the Sixth Auditor for deficiency in postal revenues, 1885 and prior years, except the claim numbered 6800 in said Executive Document No. 377, $2,677.04.

Mr. RAYNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting, after line 9, page 66, as follows: To pay M. C. Mordecai, mail contractor, as per order of the Postmaster-General, dated January 2, 1861, for allowance of one month's extra pay for discontinuance of service, allowed by the Sixth Auditor of the Treasury in Executive Document No. 26, item 138, of the Forty-seventh Congress, $3,333.33.

Mr. BURNES. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is before the committee I desire to make the point of order against it, but I will reserve the point until the gentleman has an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. RAYNER. I will ask to have read the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1883.

SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant, addressed to the honorable Postmaster-General requesting to be informed what amount, if any, remains unpaid of the one month's extra pay allowed M. C. Mordecai, on discontinuance of service under his contract on route from Charleston, S. C., to Key West, Fla., has been forwarded to this office.

In reply, I have the honor to inform you that no part of the one month's extra pay allowed Mr. Mordecai, under the orders of the Postmaster-General dated January 2, 1861, which amounts to $3,333.33, has yet been paid by this office, for lack of the necessary appropriation.

This claim was taken to the Court of Claims in 1883, and is known in said court as cause No. 13412, but what action, if any, has been taken by said court in the case, this office has not been advised.

Very respectfully,

D. McCONVILLE, Auditor.

Hon. I. RAYNER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Chairman, this is an eminently just claim which ought to have been paid long ago, and I do not think that any point of order will lie against it. It arises upon a contract between the Government and the claimant to carry the mails from Charleston to Key West, by way of Savannah, for a compensation of $40,000 a year; the contract providing that in case the mail should be discontinued the contractor was to receive an extra month's pay. There was an express provision in the body of the contract that "the Postmaster-General may curtail or discontinue the service in whole or in part, he allowing one month's extra pay on the amount dispensed with."

Now, the service was discontinued, and the Postmaster-General at that time, and his successor, both approved the validity of this claim and said that it ought to be paid. It then went to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, who decided that it ought to be paid. It then went to the Court of Claims, and they decided that it ought to be paid, but that it was barred by limitation, and therefore they could take no action in regard to it unless under authority of a special act of Congress. The money has been due for over twenty years, and it certainly ought to be paid without further delay.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does this case stand upon any other footing than ante bellum mail contracts generally?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir. This is not a claim for transporting the mails. This is a claim under a contract in which the Government agreed that in case the mail should be discontinued they would allow the contractor a month's extra compensation. They did discontinue the service, but the compensation has never been paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. But was not the contract for carrying the mails?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir; but this claim is not for the service of carrying the mails. This is a claim for a month's extra compensation arising out of the discontinuance of that mail service.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 2, 1861.

SIR: The Postmaster-General orders that the service on the route No. ——, from Charleston, S. C., via Savannah, Ga., to Key West, Fla., and back, twice a month by steam-ship "Isabel, or other steamers, if necessary," under contract with you of 3d October, 1860, at the sum of $40,000 per year, for and during the term commencing the 15th day of October, 1860, and ending the 30th day of June, 1864, be discontinued, and one month's extra pay allowed on the amount dispensed with.

This order is to take effect immediately.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HORATIO KING,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

M. C. MORDECAI, Esq.,
Charleston, S. C.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the date of that order?

Mr. RAYNER. January 2, 1861. The claimant had been carrying the mails under his contract, and the Government discontinued his service. The Postmaster-General directed that this one month's extra pay should be paid to him, according to the explicit provision of the contract that the Postmaster-General might curtail or discontinue the service in whole or in part by allowing one month's extra pay. The matter then went to the accounting officers of the Treasury, and they allowed the claim. Afterward it went to the Court of Claims, which declared that the claim ought to be allowed; but there being no special act of Congress authorizing its payment, and the claim being barred by the statutory limitation, the court held it had no jurisdiction to find final judgment. It has been admitted during various administrations of the Post-Office Department that the money is due. The claimant has been here year after year pressing his demand for the payment of that which has been admitted by the Government to be honestly due him.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman state again the date of the order of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. RAYNER. January 2, 1861, was the date of that order. The mails had been carried under this contract for about six months.

Mr. DINGLEY. For what reason was the contract discontinued?

A MEMBER. The war was just beginning.

Mr. RAYNER. This was of course just before the opening of the war; but the Government continued after that time to carry the mails in a great many of the Southern States, endeavoring to keep up the mail service as well as it could. The service under this contract was discontinued without any notice to the claimant; and in the order of discontinuance the Postmaster-General allowed this one month's extra pay. Mr. Holt, who succeeded to the office of Postmaster-General, passed favorably upon the validity of the claim.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is it not a claim that should take the usual order which claims take before Congress?

Mr. RAYNER. It has taken that order. It has been before the Court of Claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has it been before the Committee on Claims and reported favorably?

Mr. RAYNER. It has not. The language of the Court of Claims is the following:

On the 3d day of October, 1860, just before the organization of the rebellion against the United States, by the passage of ordinances of secession by some of the States, the claimant entered into a written contract with the Postmaster-General to carry the mails by steam-ships from Charleston, S. C., to Key West and back, twice a month, commencing October 15, 1860, and ending June 30, 1864, at the compensation of $40,000 a year.

The Legislature of South Carolina passed an ordinance of secession December 20, 1860, and other Southern States soon did the same. The mail service in all those States became disorganized even before the passage of those ordinances; and yet during that time, as well as afterwards and until the goverment of the Confederate States was fully organized, the mails continued to be carried somewhat irregularly on most of the routes under existing contracts with the United States.

In the case of Reeside vs. The United States (8 Wall., 38, and 7 Ct. Cls. R., 89) the Supreme Court say in relation to the condition of affairs then existing:

"The policy of the Government was to conciliate the people, and to separate them, if possible, from the leaders; and one of the means used for this purpose was to continue these mail and postal accommodations so long as any hope existed of preventing the rebellion or continuing peaceful relations."

As to this particular route now under consideration, however, the Postmaster-General availed himself of a reservation in the contract that—

"The Postmaster-General may curtail or discontinue the service in whole or in part, he allowing one month's extra pay on the amount dispensed with."

And on the 2d day of January, 1861, he made an order to take effect immediately, of which the claimant was duly notified, that the service under their contract should be "discontinued, and one month's extra pay allowed on the amount dispensed with."

Thereafter the claimant performed no further service.

By the express terms of the contract, as well as by the order of the Posmaster-General, the United States thereupon became indebted to the claimant in the sum of $3,333.33, for the amount of one month's extra pay, and that obligation has never been discharged.

That this sum was and still is due to the claimant can not be doubted, and is conceded on the part of the defendants.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has this been adjudicated by the Court of Claims?

Mr. RAYNER. The court decided the facts in favor of the claimant, but could not give judgment because of the statutory bar. That is the statement of the court at the end of the opinion. This claim has hung on in Congress year after year. The claimant, who has been long waiting for his money, is now in almost destitute circumstances.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to defeat this claim by pressing a point of order against it, although I am satisfied that the age of the claim and its date justify us in looking to the question which has not been passed upon—the loyalty of the claimant. Now, mark you, I am probably no less disposed to the payment of claims, whether the claimant was loyal or disloyal, than other members on this floor, if the claims are just and honest claims against the Government. But the settled and constantly pursued policy of Congress for twenty-seven years has been against the payment of claims like this. Whether the point of order is good or bad, I leave it for the Chair to decide, simply saying that I trust this House under no circumstances will at this time undertake to depart from its settled policy and make appropriations for claims like this. Rather, sir, let this claim take its chance, like all kindred claims, before the committees of this House whose duty it is to deal with such claims, and let us leave the appropriation bills free from matters of this kind.

Mr. RAYNER. What is the point of order that the gentleman makes against this claim? I would like to know.

Mr. BURNES. Well, I will say because it is a claim. Because there is an element of claim in it that has not been passed upon either by the courts of the country or by the accounting officers of the Treasury, namely, the loyalty of the claimant.

Mr. RAYNER. Why, the Court of Claims and the accounting officers of the Treasury have both passed upon it, and it does not come within the law which provides that money within the Treasury not paid out within two years shall be covered back into the Treasury, because of the fact that the appropriation for the payment was never actually made. I have the allowance here and a statement of the accounting officers of the Treasury. He is a loyal man now. I do not think there is any proof or even any charge of disloyalty at this time.

I do not see, therefore, that there is any point about that, nor should it enter into the question; nor does it come within that provision of law to which I have referred, the two years' limit, because it has not yet been provided for, although the Treasury officials have allowed it and the Court of Claims have passed upon it; and had it not been for the limitation on that court they would have given judgment for the amount of the claim. This allowance was made on the 14th day of June, 1878, in the estimate for payments under this head:

Estimates for the payment of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department under the provisions of section 4 of the act of July 14, 1878, payable from appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, etc.

Under which head appears the following:

M. C. Mordecai, mail contractor: For allowance of one month's extra pay, per order of the Postmaster-General dated January 2, 1861; for discontinuance of service, $3,333.33.

J. H. ELA.

Everything has been done that could be done in support of the case. It has been allowed by the Sixth Auditor, and also by the report of the Court of Claims; and, as I have said, the judgment would have been entered but for the reason that the court had not jurisdiction owing to the time that had elapsed since the claim originated.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Did the Court of Claims hold that as the only reason for the disallowance?

Mr. RAYNER. The court say that there is no defense of disloyalty set up. The court refers to the Revised Statutes, section 3480, which made it unlawful for any officer to pay any amount, claim, or demand against the United States which accrued or existed prior to the 13th of April, 1861, "in favor of any person who promoted, encouraged, or in any manner sustained the late rebellion, or in favor of any person who, during such rebellion, was not known to be opposed thereto and distinctly in favor of its suppression." This question, then, of loyalty is something new, set up now, although this claim has been going on this way for twenty-five years.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. But the United States may have thought the defense of limitation was sufficient.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, but they passed upon the validity of the claim. They acted on it, and they go on to say:

The original cause of action accrued more than six years before the filing of the petition in this court by the claimant, and his claim is not one of those for the payment of which provision was made by the act of March 3, 1877. The court therefore has no jurisdiction of the case, and the petition must be dismissed.

The court held that under the provisions of the act of March, 1877, the court had no jurisdiction in the premises. But they passed upon the facts. You have the contract with the Government and you have an express provision in the contract that the contractor shall be paid this money; that is to say, one month's compensation in the event of a discontinuance of the service by the order of the Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman refers to the act of March 3, 1877. Is that the appropriation bill providing for certain ante bellum claims which had been acted upon and sent up from the Sixth Auditor?

Mr. RAYNER. I think likely it is. But let me state that this case does not belong to that class of claims. This is for payment for a breach of contract for carrying the mails and for actual service. It is on a contract which agreed to give the contractor one month's pay, provided the Government should discontinue the route during the pendency of the contract. It is a distinction which the Court of Claims clearly makes; that is to say, it comes under the head of a contract on which the service was discontinued.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Government contracted with him to carry the mails?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHAW. And the Government terminated the contract.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; on account of which this balance became due.

Mr. SHAW. That provision is made in all contracts to give the contractor a month's pay where the service is discontinued; and it is provided in the case now before us that an extra month's pay was to be given in case of a discontinuance.

Mr. RAYNER. The court have passed upon that, and they say:

The claimant would be entitled to judgment in his favor if his claim was embraced in the description of those for which the appropriation is thus made.

Referring to the act to which I have heretofore called attention. But they say also—

That this sum was, and still is, due to the claimant can not be doubted and is conceded on the part of the defendants.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Are any of these claims, for which appropriation was made, from the South?

Mr. RAYNER. I do not know how that may be.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is no more a deficiency than hundreds and thousands of other claims of like character which may be sought to be appended to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP in the chair). The Chair will be compelled to hold, unless the gentleman can cite some statute law authorizing the expenditure, that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. RAYNER. The only law that I can cite, Mr. Chairman, is the action on this claim by the Court of Claims, to which I have called attention, the allowance by the Auditor of the Treasury of the claim, and the statement on the part of the Postmaster-General that the claim should be paid. Now, the law which provides that money which has been unpaid and lying in the Treasury for two years shall revert to the Treasury does not apply to this claim at all, because there has been no appropriation for this particular amount. But we claim under the decision of the Auditor of the Treasury, and of the Court of Claims, and the opinion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I will just submit to the Chair this point in relation to the question which the Chair asked in reference to the power of the House to act upon this claim now, that the law which authorized the payment of this allowance to the claimant in this case is the law which authorized the Postmaster-General to make the contract, which had a provision inserted in it that in case he made a breach of the contract by a discontinuance of the route there should be paid one month's compensation to the contractor. The law which authorized the making of the contract imposed also the obligation on the part of the Government to pay the money that is now claimed.

The Postmaster-General had exercised that function under existing law, and the legal obligation under that law attaches to the Government; and therefore it comes within a class of cases which are authorized by existing law. It was authorized by existing law that the Government should pay that one month. The Government has declared the contract off with one month's pay, and have therefore authorized it by existing law. Nothing in the world is necessary now but the appropriation; and this is the place for it.

Mr. RAYNER. The other day there was a claim passed here of the same character as this claim. I think a point of order was raised against it, but was withdrawn. It was in reference to transportation during the war. The amendment was offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], and the point of order was withdrawn, as I understand, on the ground that the claim had been passed upon by the Treasury officials. The case of the gentleman from South Carolina is the same thing substantially. The contract here provided that the claimant should be paid so much. The Treasury Department has allowed the claim, and the Court of Claims has also declared in favor of its payment. Two Postmaster-Generals have agreed that it was just. The service was discontinued. The claimant has waited twenty years for the payment of his claim. He has proved that it is a valid claim, and that it is due from the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that because a claim is just and has been allowed by the Department, it is therefore necessarily authorized by law. The Chair understands the rule to mean that on a general appropriation bill no amendment shall be in order except, in the language of the rule, for expenditures "previously authorized by law." The attention of the Chair has not been called to any law authorizing this expenditure, and he therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to detain the House but a few moments, as it is simply my desire to submit a brief financial exhibit of the condition of the national Treasury. The President in his last annual message referred to the "condition confronting" Congress and the country, and urged the immediate reduction of Federal taxation, so as to decrease the growing volume of revenue which was daily augmenting the surplus in the Treasury until it then aggregated $79,466,695.30. That untoward "condition" is to-day more pronounced, as the surplus which "confronted" us on the threshold of this session has been increased in the sum of $53,051,056.25.

I desire to invite attention to the condition of the Treasury, as shown by the Treasury books on the 1st of this month, as contrasted with its condition on the 30th of June last. During the month of July the Secretary of the Treasury purchased of 4½ per cent. bonds $659,200 and paid as premium on them $48,531. He also purchased $353,700 of 4 per cent. bonds, paying on this last class of bonds $95,701.38 as premiums, the entire purchase aggregating $1,157,132.38.

The purchases prior to July 1st, amounted to $26,776,850, on which premiums were paid amounting to $5,609,950.40, so that the entire purchase of bonds since the 23d of April last, with the premiums that have been paid, amount to $33,543,932.78.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has the gentleman figured out how much less that premium is than the amount would have been if the interest on the bonds were paid at maturity?

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not, and I do not believe it is sound business policy to tax the people and pay 27 per cent. on a debt not yet matured.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I asked the question because there seems to be some statement of a saving that has been effected in connection with the Treasury statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is very true; but speaking from a business standpoint, I confess that I have but very slight admiration for that sort of "saving."

Mr. Chairman, the revenues of the Government for the month of July were $33,613,590.40. The average daily income of the Government during the same period was $1,084,308.35—more than a million dollars pouring daily into the Treasury—whilst the daily average bond purchases amounted to but $32,677. The surplus of idle and unproductive money in the Treasury on the 30th day of June last, which was $129,272,205.90, has augmented until it now swells to the enormous aggregate of $132,517,751.55, an increase in one month of $3,245,545.65! And yet, Mr. Chairman, with this startling "condition" confronting us we have occupied days and weeks, and other days and weeks are to be consumed in discussing the mere "theories" underlying the different systems of taxation.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Can the gentleman state to the House how many bonds are due in two years?

Mr. DOCKERY. There yet remains about $220,000,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds which mature September 1, 1891.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. What provision is the Administration making for paying these bonds?

Mr. DOCKERY. The law provides that there shall be annually set aside a certain sum of money—I think about $50,000,000 (a sinking fund)—for the payment of these and other bonds of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Would it not be better policy to take the fifty or sixty millions deposited in the national banks and for which the Government is getting nothing and use it in buying these bonds?

Mr. DOCKERY. The Government issued its circular, and has been in the market ever since the 23d of April last endeavoring to purchase bonds, and has been able to buy only $33,543,932.78, and those at an enormous premium. The difficulty which President Grant foresaw when he was the Chief Executive has come to pass. The moment the Government goes into the market to buy bonds, that very moment they begin to appreciate. That is the difficulty confronting the Secretary of the Treasury to-day.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Is not the difficulty in the manner in which the Government has gone to work to buy the bonds, rather than in the fact of buying them?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think not. The Government has simply advertised, just as a private individual would advertise if he desired to purchase a certain number of bonds.

Mr. LAIRD. As a business man, what do you say to the enhancement of the value of the fours and four-and-a-halfs by the manner in which their purchase has been conducted? The four-and-a-halfs could have been bought for 107 or less if the bid had been asked in that way.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know that I exactly catch the drift of the gentleman's question, but will say that all of the four-and-a-halfs have been purchased for less than 8 per cent. We may differ as to methods, but if I understand the criticism implied by the interrogatory, I must say that I do not think it well founded, as in my opinion any other plan for purchases would have been followed by the appreciation of the bonds.

Of course I imagine that no policy which this Administration could devise would be exactly satisfactory to our friends on the other side; but if I were going to purchase bonds I do not know what course I could pursue except to advertise in some way the fact that I desired to purchase, and then if my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] had bonds to sell, I suppose he would offer them, in which event I would accept or reject as the prices seemed either reasonable or exorbitant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. If I understand the complaint of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], it is that this side of the House has pursued a policy which has resulted in increasing the surplus in the Treasury, or rather in preventing a reduction of the revenue, sought on the other side through the Mills bill. Now, I desire to say, with respect to this complaint, that gentlemen on this side of the House who have opposed the Mills bill and have contended for a revenue bill of another character have been as earnest as gentlemen on the other side to secure such a reduction of the revenue as would prevent a surplus. Nay, more; for more than a year and a half we have been ready at any time to vote for a proposition on which the other side agrees with us, and has inserted in the Mills bill, for the reduction of the revenue by abolishing the tax on tobacco, except perhaps cigars, and that notwithstanding this side of the House has stood ready for a year and a half to vote for that proposition and reduce the revenue $25,000,000, and notwithstanding gentlemen upon the other side have sought to obtain recognition to put on its passage a bill thus reducing the revenue, no such recognition has been given.

And notwithstanding at any time this session the majority of the Ways and Means Committee might have taken advantage of this agreement of both sides, and passed a bill reducing the revenue and the surplus to this extent, yet they have declined to do this. And why have they declined? Evidently in order that there might be an increasing surplus as a lever to be used to secure the overthrow of the system of protection of home industries in this country.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not yield now.

Mr. NELSON. Is there any popular demand for the repeal of the tobacco tax?

Mr. DINGLEY. I decline to yield.

Mr. NELSON. Do the people want the tobacco tax repealed?

Mr. DINGLEY. I decline to yield at this time. I simply say that the other side of the House have voted to incorporate in the tax reduction measure which they have proposed a proposition to abolish this tax, and nearly all of this side of the House would be ready to vote for that proposition under all the circumstances; and that in view of this, gentlemen on the other side would have seized upon what was practicable and passed such a bill if they had been half as desirous of reducing the revenue as they profess to be.

Mr. NELSON. Who wants the repeal of the tobacco tax?

Mr. DINGLEY. I decline to be interrupted, for the gentleman's question has nothing to do with the point I am considering. Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that this side of the House have been ready from the beginning to give their votes for the passage of a bill reducing the revenue, which should protect the industries of this country. Gentlemen will understand this, and know full well the lines on which a tax-reduction bill would receive our support. There will probably come to gentlemen upon the other side of the House, as well as to this side, before we adjourn, a bill from the Republican Senate embodying the Republican and protection views of the manner in which the revenue and surplus should be reduced, and the reduction proposed by that bill will be as much as the bill which has been proposed by the other side by the bill which has passed the House; and the "average" duty of the dutiable list will be no more than that proposed by the Mills bill, but the mode of distributing this "average" will be very different from that proposed in this bill, which retains a duty of 68 per cent. on sugar and 100 per cent. on rice, but places wool and farm products on the free-list. When a protection bill shall be returned to us from the Senate as a substitute for the Mills bill we shall see if gentlemen on the other side will be as eager to reduce the revenue when the industries of the country are to be preserved as when they are to be destroyed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the point suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, that the idle surplus of the Treasury is daily increasing, and is now over one hundred and thirty millions, why is it that with $222,000,000 of the bonds of this Government bearing 4½ per cent. interest and due in three years, and over seven hundred millions of 4 percents—bonds which can be purchased at such a rate that they will yield the Government more than 2 per cent. for its money lying idle now and in part for nearly a year past; why is it, when this can be done, that from last October to April not a single bond was purchased, notwithstanding the Government was loaning this money to pet banks without interest? I know the excuse, but every gentleman in this Hall knows that the excuse had no foundation, for precisely the same law authorizing the purchase was on the statute-book then that there is now. Surely, so long as the interest-bearing debt of the Government can be anticipated by purchase at rates which yield the Government at least 2 per cent. for its money, there is no excuse for increasing the surplus in the Treasury; and if it is increased the country will have the right to infer that this is done to maintain a lever to push Congress into adopting such a revision of the tariff as will overthrow the protective system. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYNUM. One word in reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. He says that that side of the House have been unanimous in favor of the reduction of the tobacco tax. I am not violating any secret of the Committee on Ways and Means in the statement I am about to make, because by a resolution of that committee its records have been made public. During the consideration of the bill which was introduced in the House, when the internal-revenue portion was under consideration a motion was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to repeal the entire tobacco tax. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] voted in favor of the motion, while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] voted against it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So that there was a majority of the gentleman's own side in the Committee on Ways and Means recorded against the proposition to which the gentleman has so generously proffered the solid support of his party.

Mr. LAIRD. How did the Democratic members of the committee vote?

Mr. BYNUM. They voted against it, of course.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman knows very well that the particular proposition relating to the tax on tobacco inserted in the bill passed by the House could have been incorporated into a bill alone and passed in this House at any time.

Mr. BYNUM. The gentleman stated that his party and his side were united in favor of this proposition. I merely called his attention to the vote on that single measure in committee and to the fact that a majority of his own side voted against it. His party, I undertake to say, will not support a measure repealing the tax on cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know what was the particular proposition in the Ways and Means Committee to which reference is made, but the gentleman from Indiana well knows that a proposition relating to the tobacco tax similar to that incorporated in the Mills bill would have passed this House at any time by a large majority; and I suggest to the gentleman that if he and his associates are half as anxious as they pretend to be, they will take advantage of this situation and report such a bill immediately. I predict, however, that they will not do so, because they know it will pass.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I represent what is in large part a tobacco-growing district; and I think I have as much at heart and appreciate as fully as any man representing such a district the interest and welfare of my people. I have heard it charged time and again—and some of my friends on this side seem to be nervous under the accusation—that the Republican party are in favor of abolishing all the taxes on tobacco, and that the Democratic party has refused to accede to a proposition to reduce the tax upon tobacco. What does the Mills bill do? If I understand it correctly it reduces the tax on tobacco by about $23,000,000, taking the tax off leaf-tobacco, chewing-tobacco, and smoking-tobacco, and leaving it only upon cigars and cheroots.

Now, as a representative of a tobacco-growing district and as a Democrat, I want to say to my Republican friends I am ready to meet them upon that square issue alone. In view of the proposition which has been presented here—a compromise proposition from top to bottom—the prime object of which is to reduce the surplus revenue now in the Treasury and prevent a financial crisis in the country, I invite the Republican opposition in the district in which I am a Democratic candidate, to meet me on that issue before the tobacco growers there; and I have no hesitation in saying, that as men devoted to their principles as Democrats, and devoted also to their country as good citizens, the people of my district will accept that issue squarely, and will defeat our political opponents whenever they see fit to make the issue. I am willing to accept that as the only issue in my district.

Mr. FUNSTON. Are you opposed to taking the tax off tobacco?

Mr. COMPTON. I am not. I have voted, as you did not, to take the tax off leaf-tobacco, chewing-tobacco, and smoking-tobacco, retaining a limited tax upon cigars and cheroots. Why did you not vote for that?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 10540) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; disagreed to certain amendments of the House to the Senate amendments, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HALE, Mr. FARWELL, and Mr. BECK.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the sundry civil bill, with the amendments of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Saturday next, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to extend in the RECORD his remarks delivered to-day.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a privileged question. I ask the Clerk to read the conference report which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same.

JOHN H. ROGERS,
JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES F. WILSON,
WM. M. EVARTS,
RICHARD COKE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read:

STATEMENT BY THE HOUSE CONFEREES.

The amendment of the Senate is a substitute for the House bill. The House bill divides the State of Nebraska into divisions, assigning certain counties to each division, and locates the courts at five places. The Senate amendment does not divide the State into divisions, and locates the courts at four places instead of five, dropping the town of Kearney. In other respects the conferees of the House think the bills are substantially the same.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of conferees as follows, namely:

On the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. POST, and on the bill (H. R. 1666) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes, Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. COX, and Mr. KENNEDY.

ELIZA A. CUTLER JONES.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6619) for the relief of Eliza A. Cutler Jones, and that the same be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid Mrs. Eliza A. Cutler Jones, of Scottsville, Monroe County, New York, the sum of $5,000, in five annual installments of $1,000, each, out of any money that may hereafter be appropriated for the use and benefit of the Cheyenne Indians.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BIGGS) was read, as follows:

Your committee find that Henry C. Jones, the son of the claimant in this case, with several others, while engaged in the survey of public lands in the State of Kansas, near Fort Dodge, in March, 1874, was ruthlessly murdered by a roving band of Cheyenne Indians; that Congress, recognizing the justness of claims of this kind, has paid to Mrs. O. F. Short and Mrs. James Shaw, whose husbands and sons constituted the other members of the party at the time of the massacre, $5,000 each as compensation for their loss.

Your committee think therefore that the claimant, who is now old and infirm, should receive a similar amount as compensation for the loss of her son, who was then a youth of twenty-one years, unmarried, and upon whom she depended for support, and accordingly recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. From what committee does that bill come?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. From the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims. I will state that it takes no money from the Treasury——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. But it takes it from the Indians.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Yes; under the law for depredations committed by them.

Mr. SYMES. It takes it from the Indians who engaged in the raid, and committed the depredations for which the claim is lodged.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope my friend from Kentucky will not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Have the Indians been heard?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does this come out of the funds belonging to the Indians?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It does.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURNES. I am bound to object.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I hope the gentleman will not object. This is a particularly meritorious case.

Mr. BURNES. I must object for the simple reason that there are housands of these claims equally meritorious with this. It has been the law all the time to take them out of the Indian money. Let it go through the usual channel.

LUCY M. SWINNEA AND MARY E. HANSERD.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8127) for the relief of Lucy M. Swinnea and Mary E. Hanserd.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Let the bill and report be read, subject to the right of objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a question of order. The hour of 5 o'clock has now arrived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The hour of 5 o'clock having now arrived, the House stands adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

The following petition, indorsing the per diem rated service-pension bill, based on the principle of paying all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war a monthly pension of 1 cent a day for each day they were in the service, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

By Mr. BOOTHMAN: Of Matthew Curren and 26 others, and of Elijah V. Clark and 43 others, ex-Union soldiers, of Rhode Island.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 3, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of that Department in regard to the item "heating apparatus for public buildings," contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of June 4, 1888, certain records of the Navy Department concerning the United States steam-ship Tennessee; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JACOB G. BOSTATTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] desires to ask the Senate to take some action in reference to the bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate yesterday passed the bill changing the name of "Bostatter" to "Bostalter" by an amendment erroneously reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask the Senate to agree to the bill as it passed the House. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed so as to correct the spelling of the name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment by which the name was changed from "Jacob G. Bostatter" to "Jacob G. Bostalter" will be disagreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now let the bill be passed just as it passed the House. Their spelling of the name was correct.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title was amended by the Senate. That amendment will also be disagreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a very voluminous petition from one Giles Otis Pearce, a resident of Nebraska. He sets forth a great many grievances and wrongs perpetrated upon him by officials of the United States. After reading the petition somewhat carefully, I am at a loss to understand just what is the nature of the grievances, but the petitioner claims some $5,000,000 from the Government as damages, and asks that his case may be sent to the Court of Claims. I do not know what to do with the petition except to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary for its investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if there be no objection.

Mr. PAYNE presented a petition of citizens of Athens and Meigs Counties, Ohio, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BECK presented seven petitions of citizens of Boyle County, Kentucky, praying for the passage of the per diem pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3414) granting a pension to Emma Matilda Selfridge, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 78) for the relief of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tenn., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5509) to grant to the Gulf and Chicago Air-Line Railway Company the right to construct bridges over navigable water courses, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6677) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the police force of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved January 31, 1883, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3418) for the erection of a public building at York, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MITCHELL (at the request of a member of the House of Representatives) introduced a bill (S. 3419) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Idaho, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CULLOM, it was Ordered, That J. W. Chickering be granted leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers relating to his case, no adverse report having been made.

POSTAL CRIMES.

Mr. VEST submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the Senate the enrolled bill (S. 3303) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had directed him to request the Senate to return to the House of Representatives the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., with the action of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska, and agreed to the same.

The message returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 2831) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8592) for the erection of a public building at Jackson, Mich., agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. POST managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1661) for the erection of an appraisers' warehouse in the city of New York, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. COX, and Mr. KENNEDY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1560) to extend the provisions of an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of court therein;

A bill (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio River;

A bill (H. R. 9056) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore withdrawn by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants and afterward held to be without such limits;

A bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side-track into square No. 1025, in the city of Washington; and

A bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi, at Winona, Minn.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA, NEBR.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives relating to Senate bill 182.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 3, 1888.

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to return to the House of Representatives the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the request be granted, and that the conference report and accompanying papers be returned to the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN LINES OF TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, directed to ascertain and report to the Senate whether any railroad lines located in the United States are owned, operated, or controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or any other Canadian railroad corporation; whether commerce originating in the United States is diverted from American to Canadian lines of transportation, and, if so, to what extent and by what means; and whether there is any discrimination in the charges made for tolls, or otherwise, against American vessels which pass through the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals.

Said committee is further directed to inquire fully into the question of the regulation of the commerce carried on by railroad or water routes between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and to report what legislation on the subject, if any, is necessary for the protection of the commercial interests of the United States or to promote the enforcement of the "act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

In making the inquiries required by this resolution said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a clerk and a stenographer, to sit during the recess of Congress, and to do whatever is necessary for a thorough investigation of the subject. Any subcommittee may exercise the powers hereby granted to said committee, and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers duly approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As this resolution creates a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate, it must be referred, under the rules, to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. Before that is done, if the resolution has to be referred, I should like to say one or two words in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois can proceed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a resolution which is now on the Calendar, as I am informed by the Presiding Officer, which was in the same line with this; but on further investigation, after introducing the first resolution, I concluded that there ought to be more scope given to the investigation, and I have therefore introduced the one which has just been read, believing that such an investigation as is indicated in the resolution should be made by some committee of the Senate of the United States.

I do not undertake in advance to say what the situation is fully, because I am not able to say what it is; but I have investigated enough to satisfy me that the commercial interests of our own people, and I may say almost the honor of our own country, demand that something should be done to protect the interests of the American people as against the encroachments of the corporations that are being conducted by our neighboring government of Canada.

It is well known to the country that there are two great lines of railroad built by the people, and aided by the Canadian Government in part and by the British Government, which lines skirt along upon our border from one end of the country to the other, from ocean to ocean. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway. It begins its line at Halifax, runs from there to Quebec, crosses over the St. Lawrence River at that place, and skirts along upon the St. Lawrence River and along our border until it reaches Vancouver, on the Pacific Ocean. That line, it is well known, is reaching into our country and purchasing or building railroads, for instance, to Duluth and to Minneapolis and other places in our own jurisdiction and country for the purpose of feeders to the main line of the Canadion Pacific.

What I say now is largely upon newspaper and other information which I do not regard as absolutely reliable, but it is understood, I think, generally that they have control now of the road running from Sault Ste. Marie to Duluth, and also another one running from the same place to Minneapolis, and are reaching out into this country, as I say, and getting control of feeders for the main line, so that very much of the commerce that ought to be carried on within our own jurisdiction is now carried on outside of our jurisdiction and on Canadian soil.

Not only is that true, Mr. President, but the British Government or the Canadian Government, some time ago established a line of steamers connecting with the western terminus of the Canadian Pacific, running to China and Japan and Hong Kong, for the purpose of securing the commerce from those governments and peoples to be carried, not on American roads, but upon the Canadian Pacific, and dropped down from one point to another along the Pacific line into the United States at St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, New York, and Boston, and the various centers of business in the United States.

Whatever may be the exact fact in relation to the situation, I think there is no Senator here who would disagree with me in saying that whatever can be done consistently with our relations to the Canadian Government, and under our Constitution, ought to be done, so that the commerce of the western world that comes to our borders should come upon American soil, and be carried upon American roads, instead of being carried around us upon the north.

My purpose in introducing the resolution and securing an investigation on this subject is to recommend whatever seems by the facts to be justified in legislation to secure to our own people the advantages that would be attained by the transportation of the products from the western world through our own country instead of around it and dropping into our own cities at nearest points.

I understand from reports that the Canadian Government has already an arrangement by which a subsidy of about $300,000 a year is paid by the Canadian or British Government to some three or four steamers which ply between Vancouver or the Pacific Ocean on our western border and the nations west of us, and that that line of steamers is established for the purpose of diverting the trade from China and Japan which would naturally come to the Union Pacific road, or to the Northern Pacific road, or to the Southern Pacific road, and be carried across our own country upon our great trans-continental lines, to the Canadian Pacific on our northern border.

In relation to the subsidy that had been given by the Canadian or or British Government to a line of steamers running from our western coast to those far-away countries, the purpose, as I said, was to give to the Canadian Pacific the traffic that comes from those countries which would naturally come to the roads which belong to the people of the United States and run through our own country, the result of which has been that so far as the article of tea is concerned the Canadian Pacific to-day is carrying, I believe, 42 per cent. of the product of tea that is brought to this country, and which the American people are using.

If it can be done with propriety, certainly the product that is used by the American people, of whatever character, that comes from those western countries, as well as from others, for that matter, for our people, ought to be carried upon our own roads.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question with his leave. I received by the mail, either yesterday morning or last night, a pamphlet upon the subject of Canadian transportation, which stated that the British Government had just granted a subsidy of £60,000 to a single steam-ship line from Vancouver, or some point of the British possessions in the Pacific, to China. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if he has also that information in a shape which he regards as authentic?

Mr. CULLOM. I have already spoken of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts alludes to. I have the same information, the same document or pamphlet, perhaps, to which the Senator has referred (the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railroad for 1887), showing that there has been £60,000, or $300,000, a year, in round numbers, granted as a subsidy to three ships, perhaps, that run between the Pacific coast and the nations of China and Japan, etc. By the aid of that subsidy those ships are running between our country and those countries, and are carrying, as I said awhile ago, a large part of the traffic that comes to our people—notably, the article of tea, the Canadian road carrying 42 per cent., and I have no information as to any other that comes into the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I should like further to ask the Senator—I was called out for a moment when he stated the fact before, perhaps he has stated it fully—whether it is also true that the condition of the subsidy to those three ships is that they are to be at the service of the British Government in case of war?

Mr. CULLOM. Those ships are so built, I understand, as to be used as cruisers and war vessels in case occasion should require. That is the statement made to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The British Government always requires that in respect of such contracts.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Vermont says that is always required by the British Government, a fact which I did not know.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can give the Senator from Illinois another item of traffic that this subsidized British line is engaged in, and has been for a good many months now under the subsidy. It is bringing in Chinese from Hong-Kong and other ports of Asia at the rate of about 4,000 a month and landing them in British Columbia, and they are pouring down in a great variety of streams into this country all along the border.

Mr. CULLOM. That is a fact I was not aware of and a situation that should not be allowed a day longer than the time when it can be stopped.

Now, I have another suggestion as a reason why I think this investigation ought to be made, and that is embodied also in the resolution. It has been stated through the newspapers and otherwise that the Canadian Government was discriminating against our vessels laden with grain or whatever going east in case they should go through the Welland Canal and not go any farther on the St. Lawrence River, but take the Erie Canal through our own country. I have a document in my hand called for, I believe, by a resolution of the House, a communication from Mr. Thompson, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states, among other things:

The Canadian regulations operate as a discrimination against American ports, American railroads and canals, and American vessels.

The matter was brought to the attention of Congress in the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1887, and in the letter addressed to you January 23, 1888, and the attention of the Secretary of State has been invited to the subject.

In this, as I have shown, the Acting Secretary states unqualifiedly that there has been discrimination against American vessels laden with wheat or grain or goods going east, if they pass though the Welland Canal and fail to go any farther in the direction of foreign ports, to Montreal or wherever else, but decide to come into our own country with their loads of grain in preference. I see in this paper a report of an officer of the Government, Mr. Morton, I believe, commissioner, in which he says, quoting a paper from the Canadian council, as follows:

The order in council, G. 251, of April 20, 1888, is as follows:

"His excellency in council has been pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that the special rates of toll of 2 cents per ton adopted last year for the passage through the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals of certain cereals, wheat, Indian corn, pease, barley, and rye, when shipped for Montreal, or for any other port east of Montreal, be continued during the forthcoming season of navigation and no longer, such toll covering the Welland and the St. Lawrence Canals."

* * * * * * *

It appears that on the payment of 20 cents per ton toll in the Welland Canal a free pass is given through the St. Lawrence canals, and that a refund of 18 cents per ton is allowed from the toll paid on the Welland Canal, if the proper papers showing such payment and that the cargo has been forwarded are produced at the department at Ottawa.

Showing a discrimination against the American vessel if it went through the Welland Canal and did not go any farther, but went into the United States. Again:

Under the present system of discriminating in favor of shipments down the St. Lawrence and against shipment through the United States, the use of the canals is not secured to the citizens of the United States on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion, there being a discrimination virtually in favor of said inhabitants and an infringement of the spirit, at least, of the treaty. Citizens of the United States using the canals and shipping over our territory are on a less favorable footing than the inhabitants of Canada using the canals and shipping by routes running through their territory.

I am not advised that the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to impose tolls upon vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie or the St. Clair Flats Canal, and bound for Canadian ports, and understand that legislation would be necessary for the exercise of such authority. In view of the action of the Canadian Government, and the construction which it appears to attach to the section cited above, it would seem proper for Congress to authorize the collection of tolls on vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal to offset the discrimination aforesaid. And after investigation I have no doubt of the power of Congress to legislate accordingly. It is suggested, however, that the collection of the tolls be placed under the Secretary of War rather than of the Treasury, the former being already charged by law with certain jurisdiction over the property.

The agreement in the treaty as to the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal by Canadian citizens on terms of equality with citizens of the United States seems to have been absolute, while the agreement as to the use of the Welland Canal by citizens of the United States was conditional upon the adoption of the regulation by the Canadian Government. If the British Government has carried out its agreement to urge upon the Government of Canada to secure to United States citizens the use of the Welland and of the other Canadian canals on terms of equality with Canadian inhabitants, it would seem that its efforts have met with small success.

As the matter stands there is a material discrimination by the existing Canadian regulations against American ports, American vessels, and American railroads and canals in the matter of the shipment of grain and other merchandise through the Welland Canal for exportation.

This document, as Senators will see, refers to the treaty of 1871, made between the United States and the British Government or Canada, in which the British Government proposed as one of the provisions of the treaty to use its good offices in trying to prevail upon Canada to do so and so; in other words, to treat Americans equally fairly with their own citizens. But, as the commissioner here states, if they undertook to do it they have very greatly failed in their effort, because it appears very plainly that discrimination against the American people has been going on.

What I am saying to-day is said more for the purpose of drawing the attention of the country to the situation, so that we may get whatever information or light the people may furnish us as to the condition of affairs existing between this country and Canada in our commercial relations. Their conduct has been largely based upon the treaty of 1871, as I said. A portion of it, as has been repeated here very frequently within the last month or two in the discussion of the fisheries treaty, has been abrogated by the American Government, but that portion which applies to the inland commerce, the commerce upon our vessels and our railroads or their railroads, has not been abrogated. I desire to read the article of the treaty of 1871 which applies to the particular subject under discussion.

ARTICLE XXIV.

It is agreed that, for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at the ports of New York, Boston, and Portland, and any other ports in the United States which have been or may from time to time be specially designated by the President of the United States, and destined for Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the territory of the United States, under such rules, regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue as the Government of the United States may from time to time prescribe; and under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, from such possessions through the territory of the United States for export from the said ports of the United States.

It is further agreed that, for the like period, goods, wares, or merchandise arriving at any of the ports of Her Britannic Majesty's possessions in North America, and destined for the United States, may be entered at the proper custom-house and conveyed in transit, without the payment of duties, through the said possessions, under such rules and regulations, and conditions for the protection of the revenue, as the governments of the said possessions may from time to time prescribe; and, under like rules, regulations, and conditions, goods, wares, or merchandise may be conveyed in transit, without payment of duties, from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States, or for export from ports in the said possessions.

The articles of the treaty relating to fisheries, as I said, have all been abrogated, but the article which I refer to, relating to goods passing through the respective possessions, has not been abrogated; and it seems to me that this is another evidence that whenever the American Government makes a treaty it makes a mistake, because that provision of the treaty to-day is probably in the way of the American nation in doing what it ought to do and what it must do eventually in order to protect the American interests and the commerce of this country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that article terminable on notice?

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to refer to that point. The very beginning of the article is, "It is agreed that for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII," which is the term of ten years, which term of ten years has expired. Then under Article XXXIII a provision is made as to the manner of getting rid of an article by authorizing the President of the United States to give notice, and in two years after that time the treaty will be abrogated and considered of no effect. My judgment is that this is one of the things which ought to be done now by this Government, or as soon as it can be done, so as to get rid of that provision of the treaty, which seems to stand in the way somewhat of the American people doing what is necessary to be done in order to protect our interests.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate longer, further than to say that the Congress of the United States has undertaken to regulate commerce under the Constitution, carrying out unquestionably a clearly defined constitutional power, and one which it seems to me ought to have been carried into effect many years before it was.

It is said by some that the act of Congress regulating commerce within the United States places the railroads of the United States at a disadvantage because of the encroachment upon our trade and commerce by the Canadian Government. There may be something in that statement, but I undertake to say that the American people will not let go of the right to regulate commerce within the United States because a power adjoining us may perhaps be taking advantage of it.

In other words, the American people will demand not only that Congress shall regulate commerce within the United States but that the Government shall take such steps as will protect the American people in the conduct of its commerce in connection with any other government that may be undertaking to interfere with it. If the treaty to which I have referred is in the way, we have the power to get rid of it. If any legislation is necessary in order to protect our commerce and our railroads on American soil, it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to enact it.

I have, as I said, simply called the attention of Congress to this subject this morning in the hope that the country generally may take it up and consider it, and that we may eventually, and very soon, arrive at a correct conclusion as to what our duty is in the premises in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask the permission of the Senate to say a few words.

A week or ten days since the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, introduced a resolution looking to the general investigation of this question. I asked that it might be laid aside for a few days, with a view of offering an amendment to it. The Senator kindly consented; and he has this morning remodeled his resolution, after conference, so as to embrace the entire subject, as I understand it.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce have for the past two years given a good deal of attention to the question of transportation within the United States, and they have necessarily had their attention drawn very sharply to the question of transportation through Canada and the rights of the Canadian railroads to transport goods in bonded cars. I agree with the honorable Senator from Illinois that the Interstate Commerce Committee should necessarily have charge of the question and make a further examination.

I find, however, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] had a resolution passed, I think upon the 31st of July, appointing a select committee of this body to be charged with the duty of examining this question in all of its details and all the commercial relations between this country and Canada. So it is possible we may have two committees investigating the same subject. It may be that the intention of the Senator from Massachusetts was to investigate another branch of it which is broader and deeper and looks to the whole commercial relations between this country and Great Britain.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I beg to say that the resolution which I offered was introduced before that of the Senator from Illinois; but the Senator from Illinois shortly after introduced his resolution, and I informed him that it seemed to me quite proper that the Committee on Interstate Commerce which had already investigated the subject of our railroad transportation in this country between the States (which is so intermingled with our relations with the transportation interests of Canada and Canada's relations with ours) should still retain charge of that whole subject and should pursue the investigation, and that it would be the purpose of the committee appointed on my motion, so far as I could control it, it was not my own purpose at any rate if I should be upon the committee, to undertake to go into this particular investigation, but to make a general report upon our entire commercial relations with Canada, which involves the exchange of products, a subject far outside of the mere transportation relation, to avail ourselves of the conclusions and facts found by the Interstate Commerce Committee in making a general statement of the result, but beyond that I do not think there will be any desire to go into it.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, for I think the subject is probably broad enough for the two committees with the division of labor suggested by him.

Mr. President, I consider this one of the most important, if not the most important, questions that is before the American public at this time. The transit trade had its origin in an emergency. It was inaugurated as an expedient for subserving the interests of the United States. It began about the 1st of April, 1855, upon the completion of the railway suspension-bridge across the Niagara River at a point 2 miles below the falls, the Great Western Railway of Canada extending from that point to a point opposite the city of Detroit, in connection with the New York Central and the Michigan Central. We then, for the first time, permitted a foreign railway company to come in competition with and to share a part of the business from our side, and carry it over that road through to its termination in Canada.

Of course at that time it was not perfectly understood. The construction of that bridge was a great event in the history of this continent, and nobody at that time anticipated that Canadian railroads would become great rivals of the American roads or would seriously jeopardize the business of this country. So matters drifted along until 1866, when Congress, acting under the pressure, I have no question, of those who were engaged and interested in the Canadian roads and their branches in the United States, who came here and asked for it, passed an act which permitted the Secretary of the Treasury—and it has been by some of the best lawyers construed to be more than a permission, a requirement—to permit goods that were sealed in cars to pass from Canada through our territory and back into Canada without paying duty; in other words, opening up absolute free trade on all the goods which passed over the territory of the United States back into Canada. And that act stands to-day unrepealed.

In 1871, when the treaty of Washington was negotiated, the Canadians in that treaty, as my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] believes on the fisheries question, outgeneraled the American commissioners and secured not only in the thirtieth article of that treaty, which has since been abrogated, but in the twenty-ninth article, the incorporation of two or three words which gave the Canadian roads the right to this transit trade until that article shall be abrogated. I do not think it can be denied that the last clause of the second paragraph of Article XXIX grants to Canadian railroads the right to convey goods, wares, and merchandise in transit without payment of duty from the United States through the said possessions to other places in the United States; and it constitutes a privilege greater in magnitude than all the rest of the treaty put together, and yet it stands without any intimation whatever of granting to the railroads of the United States the obvious reciprocal privilege of transporting goods from one part of the Dominion of Canada to another part of the Dominion.

So we came to 1885, when the Secretary of the Treasury, the late Mr. Manning, a man with strong, good sense, not a lawyer, but always going to the kernel of every question that he undertook to investigate, said at once and said it publicly in a document sent to the Congress of the United States, there is but one way to settle all questions in dispute between our Government and Canada, and that is to prohibit the transportation of goods through the United States, prevent that and we will get all the rights that we demand for your fishermen and all the rights that are required for our railroad interests; and he, on the 2d of July, 1885, issued circular No. 102, which prohibited the transit of Canadian goods through the United States.

Subsequently the question was examined by the law officers of the Government, and he was advised that not only under the act of 1866, but under the treaty of Washington, made in 1871, he had not the right to prevent this transit of goods in Canadian cars; and from that time, July 24, 1885, when that decision was made, Congress has never done anything on the subject, although I called attention to the fact when we were considering a resolution relating to the fishery question, and I offered a resolution authorizing and directing the President of the United States to prohibit this transit of goods in Canadian cars, not only with a view to the fishery rights, but with a view also to this transit of goods within our own country. I am sorry to say that the resolution received only a few votes.

So whatever trouble comes from this entire question comes from the legislation of Congress in 1866 and from the treaty of Washington made in 1871, and your failure to act by taking the matter in hand, as I believe it should have been taken, and controlling it and disposing of it by Congress.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me to put a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I ask whether the power or authority which the Senator's resolution proposed to confer upon the President, or at any rate which it proposed to request him to use, was not contained in the statute of 1887?

Mr. GORMAN. I did not hear the Senator; there is so much confusion.

Mr. HOAR. I asked whether the statute of 1887 giving the President the power, which has been referred to so often in debate, did not confer upon the President full authority to do all that was contemplated by the resolution to which the Senator from Maryland refers?

Mr. GORMAN. I believe I am one of the four or five lay members of this body, for I think all are lawyers but four or five, and I would not attempt to venture an opinion except as a layman. I do not think such power is conferred, and when I find that there is such an absolute difference of opinion between distinguished lawyers as to the construction of it I take the common-sense view that the President has not the power.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question. Was there not a transportation of goods immediately after the building of the bridge across the Niagara River, and did that not continue up to the enactment of the law of 1866?

Mr. GORMAN. It did.

Mr. FRYE. Can the Senator inform the Senate under what authority that transportation in bond was had over that road and over that bridge?

Mr. GORMAN. I do not think there was any authority at that time. As I have said, the construction of that bridge was one of the great events of this continent. It was not thought by anybody at that time, not dreamed of, that it would be a competing line for the transportation of American goods, and the Treasury Department, or the President, whoever gave the order—I am not sure but it was the Treasury Department—gave it, I think, without any authority of law, so far as I am able to find. They permitted it, and it continued down to the passage of the act of 1866.

Mr. FRYE. I offered a resolution, which was adopted a few days ago, calling on the Department for the history of that whole transaction.

Mr. GORMAN. I am delighted that the Senator did so.

Mr. FRYE. A reply was received, but it was not the history I was seeking. I think it announced that during all those years, without any law at all, these goods were allowed to pass in bond across this Canadian bridge.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, while we have acted in perfect good faith, while we have permitted Canadian cars to come and go freely and without hinderance, and while they have been getting an undue proportion of this trade, they have discriminated against us in every particular. It has been stated by the highest authorities that by rebates and drawbacks, both for railroad transportation and for transportation through their canals, an advantage of at least 18 cents a ton has been given where wheat and other productions of the Northwest have been carried in Canadian vessels, thus driving out and preventing American vessels from participating in that trade.

When the Canadian Pacific Railway was incorporated, subsidized by Great Britain, then began for the first time a formidable raid upon our American commerce and transportation interests that means something. The British Government has given that road a sufficient amount of money to build it through a barren wilderness, to operate it, and to maintain it, and has given it the exclusive right to build a railroad within 300 or 400 miles of its territory, so that an American company can not be organized and extend its lines through the Dominion of Canada.

The only instance is the one of the Manitoba road, which occurred only within the past year and a half, where they took forcible possession because the people of Manitoba wanted that road as a competing line. The British Government or the Canadian Government gave the Canadian Pacific $10,000,000 because of the violation of the contract. They have extended that road to Puget Sound in perfect operation, but it was yet comparatively valueless unless they could obtain further foothold in the United States. So they have obtained from Maine, they have obtained from Vermont, and from other States bordering on Canada, the right to come in and through American organizations obtain charters for the construction of railroads with the money with which the British Government or Canadian Government subsidized them, and the State of Maine to-day and the State of Vermont (whether they have the perfect legal right to do it or not, I will not venture to express an opinion) are being used for the purpose of diverting this great commerce from our American ports.

Whether one of the United States has the right to grant such a charter as the State of Maine has granted to the International Railway Company, and permit its operation as a part of the through line of the Canadian Pacific, when it is an open and notorious fact that it is a subsidized road of Canada, receiving $175,000 per annum for ten years from the Dominion Government, I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts, is a question for his most careful consideration, and if a State can exercise such power then to report what remedy we have, for it is an undeniable fact that this International road which passes through Maine to St. John, N. B., and to Halifax, N. S., will, when completed, enable the Canadian Pacific to reach Halifax and compete not only for the trade of the great Northwest, but it will give them an advantage of at least two days' time between Japan and Liverpool over the American line, which means the absolute monopoly of that trade. Now, let me read the distances by their road from Montreal to St. John and to Halifax by routes wholly within the British provinces:

The great saving of distance by the British line is in the ocean service. That makes about two days in favor of the Britsh route as against the American line, which means a monopoly of this entire trade.

Mr. President, if my figures are correct, it becomes a serious question—a very serious question. There is also a personal aspect of the case, with all of these rights obtained from our Government, with all these untold millions poured out by the Canadian or British Government to subsidize these roads, to enable them to be constructed at a cost much below that of the American roads, and to be operated at a loss, if it becomes necessary, to break up or bankrupt our lines of transportation.

They have obtained these rights in Vermont and Maine, and in other States. Those are not the only two States, for there are any number of roads in the West, controlling, as I believe, the approach to the bridge across the Sault Ste. Marie. It is said other roads are about to pass under Canadian control. It is a great temptation, it has been too great for our enterprising American citizens. Boston and New York and Philadelphia, and other cities and some States of the Union have contributed enterprising men, who are ready to share in the profits of this great bounty that the British Government has given, and it becomes a serious question when you look at the distinguished men who are associated with these Canadian or British enterprises.

Turn, Mr. President, to the great railroad record in Poor's Manual, and you will find some of the names boldly proclaimed, without the slightest hesitation, of Americans who associate themselves in these enterprises. You will find the names of some of the most distinguished men in the United States. There are some who are candidates for high offices. One of the candidates for the second office in the Government is a director in the Canadian Pacific road. I will read the list. I take this statement from Poor's Manual:

The following is a list of the officers and directors of the Canadian Pacific and International Railway Companies:

CANADIAN PACIFIC.

Sir George Stephen, president; William C. Van Horne, vice-president; Sir Donald Smith, director; R. B. Angus, director; E. B. Osler, director; William Whyte, general superintendent; Sanford Fleming, director; Levi P. Morton, W. L. Scott, and others.

INTERNATIONAL IN MAINE.

Sir George Stephen, director; William C. Van Horne, president; Sir Donald Smith, director; R. B. Angus, director; E. B. Osler, director; William Whyte, director; Sanford Fleming, director.

Now, Mr. President, I submit that it is time for the American Congress, without regard to party, to recognize this condition of affairs. These Americans whose names I have read are the directors in the Canadian Pacific road and branches. They had a perfect right to become such.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has the Senator from Maryland taken the trouble to examine who the directors are in the companies that control the roads running through Northern Michigan?

Mr. GORMAN. I have not. I do not know who they are, but I desire this committee to ascertain the directory in every one of them.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say if the Senator will examine those records he will find that the present chairman of the Democratic national committee is one of them.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no doubt of it. He is another enterprising railroad man, but he is not a candidate for the office of Vice-President of the United States. He is a private citizen.

I do not believe there ought to be any politics in this question, but as the Senator has brought it out so pointedly, I say to him that I do not believe any man who is a candidate for a high office, be he either a Democrat or a Republican, who if elected might become President of the United States, could properly accept the office until he had purged himself of every interest in these British enterprises. It is not a question of politics; I have not brought it in for that purpose. I know that the whole of this question has been sought to be made one of politics, but I think it will remain forever a blot upon the history of the Senate that these great questions between England and the United States have been kicked around here as a political foot-ball. It is the first time it has been in the history of the country, and the Republican party is the only party that has ever attempted it.

But, Mr. President, to me it is more than politics. I did not introduce it here for any party advantage. Mistakes have been made by both parties in the past. In 1855, when the Democrats controlled the country, they ought never to have permitted the Canadians to cross at Niagara Falls without proper regulations. In 1866, when you had two-thirds of both Houses, you made an immense blunder by passing the act which gave them that right; and in 1871, when the Government was still in your possession, you perpetuated it and made it absolutely necessary for us to continue it so long as the treaty of Washington remains in force.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland one question. I understand a different construction has been placed on the act of 1866 than that which he places upon it now; and the construction recently placed upon it is different from that adopted by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning, on account of an opinion of a law officer of the Government at that time. I ask the Senator who was that law officer? Was it the Attorney-General, or some other law officer?

Mr. GORMAN. I have stated the action of Secretary Manning in that matter, who was not himself a lawyer. He said that to stop this trade was an absolute necessity to American interests, and one of the law officers of the Government examined the question, taking the act of 1866, which some good lawyers hold is only permissive, in connection with the twenty-ninth article of the treaty of Washington, which stands, and I do not know that anybody ever questioned that under that article of the treaty they had a perfect right to this transit. The Department then reversed its action and permitted these goods to go through.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand all that; but what I want to know of the Senator is, if he will be kind enough to tell me, whether it was the present Attorney-General of the United States, the Solicitor-General, or the Solicitor of the Treasury who placed this construction on the legislation of 1866.

Mr. GORMAN. I am not prepared to say who gave the opinion, but that is the law and there is the treaty, and there this Administration has stood and stands to-day, bound by the law and bound by the treaty, and from the day that this matter first came here for discussion England has, I think, the key to the whole situation, not only as to your transportation but as to all the balance of the roads of Canada. We have sat from December until now, and neither the Foreign Relations Committee nor any other committee of this body has taken this matter up for the purpose of disposing of it as in my judgment it should have been disposed of, by closing up and wiping out the whole transaction.

The point I make in bringing the names of these distinguished Americans here is this: that we know how men will follow their interests; we know when they invested in the Canadian roads and placed themselves in a position to get a part of the English bounty they had a perfect right to do it; that is, they had a legal right to do it. They are men of such distinguished character and consequence in this country that we are bound to take note of it, not as partisans, but as American citizens, and make it impossible for these roads to destroy our interests, if they can go so far; and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will look into the question and ascertain whether a State of this Union, whether Maine or Vermont or Michigan or the others that have granted these great rights to these Canadian roads, had a right to do it, or whether Congress has not the exclusive control over interstate commerce, whether it passes only between our own States or over part of the Canadian territory.

It is a great question, Mr. President, and one which we can not shirk any longer. It is one that is not necessarily and should never in any phase of it in my judgment have been brought in here as a partisan question. I, as a Democrat, and the Senator from Massachusetts, as a Republican, but both Americans, ought to be here to-day in private council, not discussing these matters as partisans, but aiding this Administration, counseling with it, advising it, and instructing it, if you will, so as to promote not only the great transportation interest but everything that follows in its wake.

If the table of distances I have given be correct—and I think they are, because the table is taken from an English quarterly review, where they advertise this route—they have the advantage of two days between Japan and Liverpool in point of time over the American lines. They have a subsidized line of steamers from the terminus of the Pacific route on that great sheet of water, Puget Sound, to Japan. With their subsidized lines on the Pacific and their advantages over us in the carrying trade on the North Atlantic, unless something is done we shall make an absolute and total surrender of all that great trade to which this country is entitled, because it was the pioneer in constructing the lines across the plains at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars. It will be pusillanimous in us if we do not lay aside partisanship and take this question and meet it as Americans.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Maryland whether any part of this British subsidy goes to the railroad chartered and built or to be built in the State of Maine?

Mr. GORMAN. I can not speak with absolute accuracy, but from the best information I have been able to obtain the amount that is being received by the road that runs through the State of Maine—and I have here somewhere a small map showing its exact location—from the Canadian Pacific, which of course is the Canadian Government, is $175,000 a year for ten years.

It will be seen, if the Senator will look at the map, that it is in almost a direct line between Montreal and Halifax, passing through the northern part of Maine and then down through Nova Scotia. It is owned by the Canadian Pacific. It is organized by a charter granted by the State of Maine, the majority of the directors being American citizens, some of whose names I have read.

I could furnish the Senate, as it appears in Poor's Manual, the list of all the directors in this road. Its charter is obtained from the State of Maine; it is subsidized by the Canadian Pacific, and I say that if it is permitted to go on, not only will it absorb the trade, but what is more it is bringing into close business relations with it that class of American citizens who have a power and influence in shaping the affairs of their own Government.

That ought not to be longer tolerated, and I cite you this remarkable case of a gentleman running for the office of Vice-President of the United States, being a director in such a corporation, as well as prominent Democrats, although not candidates for office; and the Senator from Oregon has called my attention to one or two of them who are private citizens, but men of worth and standing and wealth. That is all wrong from the American standpoint.

I am delighted that the Senator from Illinois has introduced this resolution.

Now let it go on and be probed to the bottom, and he and I know, as members of the committee of which he is chairman, that it has been impossible for us to get at the facts with a view of intelligently making legislation for our own roads. It can not be done without a thorough and complete investigation, and the fact does stand out to-day that except for the coercion by some of the American interests the Canadian Pacific would bankrupt the Northern Pacific, the Union, and the Central; they can not compete with it to-day for the through traffic.

The Canadian road does open the door, as the Senator from Oregon has said, also to the introduction of the Chinese, against whom we are constantly legislating. Let us stop this transit in bond and confine them to their own lines in Canada, and we can make any arrangement that is right and proper, not only for our fishing interest, but we can make it so as to exclude the Chinese and make them our agents to do it, or else you will bankrupt the Canadian Government.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator states that our roads, the Northern Pacific, the Union Pacific, and the Central Pacific, can not compete with the Canadian Pacific. Will he please tell us why?

Mr. GORMAN. I have stated to the Senate that it is because the difference in distance between Japan and Liverpool is about 1,200 miles in favor of the Canadian route. I do not give the exact figures—it is equal to two days in time between Japan and Liverpool. Therefore for all of that through trade it would be utterly impossible for our roads to compete with them.

When it comes to domestic trade the fact that the Canadian Pacific road has had enough money from the Canadian Government not only to build the road, but that it is being maintained as a line not merely for transportation, but as a military necessity, they are in position to make any rate to take the traffic; they are moderate about it, because they are still anxious to get more of our American citizens to join them and still further extend their lines into our territory, but they are making such rates that our roads can not possibly carry the goods whenever it is necessary for them to control traffic as against our interests. It is the same with their steam-ships. They are subsidized, paid a liberal compensation at least for carrying the mails, and we have not one upon the ocean.

I remarked a moment ago that twenty-five years since the American people spent hundreds of millions to get this trade, and we have since 1866, when the country has been in peace, with no partisanship about it, when you had absolute control of both branches of Congress and the Executive; and now when we have only the Executive and one branch of Congress, here we stand trying to get partisan advantage over each other while this whole trade, the trade of a hemisphere, is passing away from us to an insignificant people in point of population. Sixty millions of Americans, strong enough, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has said, to meet the world, are outgeneraled and our business is being taken away by our neighbors on the north. I say, Mr. President, it is time that we should meet these questions, not as partisans, but as patriots.

I know the struggle it will be in Maine and Vermont and in Michigan, if you please, and some other States where Canadian money and English money are building these roads and making this enterprise profitable to their local interests. Great as my friend from Vermont is, I doubt very much whether he is prepared to come up and drop all partisanship and take up this question and wipe out the local interests along that border and join the Democratic party, not as Democrats, but as Americans, in protecting this great American interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I join the Democratic party it will have one quality besides the only democratic quality it has now, and that is its name, and to that party I have belonged ever since I was old enough to vote and I expect to belong to it. The fault of the Democratic party is that the only democratic thing about it is its name. It has had the House of Representatives for ten or twelve years, the tribunes of the people, those who are immediately expected to take care of these great interests, and who, so far as revenue in any way is concerned, have the sole right to begin; and we have never heard a hint or an intimation of any attempt to rectify these prodigious evils that my friend from Maryland has now for the first time discovered.

It is possible that some interests of the State of Maryland (as he refers to Vermont interests) in the form of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, of which I believe he is an honored and certainly a most valuable director, if he is, may have led him into an intenser concern in this subject than the general patriotism which we know fills his body as it does all others would have led him to do. It is perfectly right that it should be so, because when we have a Senate or a Congress of men who have no business interests in this world we shall have a very poor set of people to represent the interests of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the Senator will permit me to say a word.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. GORMAN. I am very glad that the Senator has referred to the fact that I am a director of a railroad. I am; but I am not a private director in any road in the United States. When the great road which Maryland created, in which she put her money, was permitted or about to be permitted to pass under the control of a syndicate as powerful as that which controls the Canadian roads, I was selected as a public man to protect the interests of my State, and to prevent this syndicate from taking the Baltimore and Ohio. Now I trust my friend will purge himself as I have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will purge myself by saying that I was never a director in any railroad whatever. So enough for that. But I do not see the difference between the attitude of my distinguished friend as a director for the State of Maryland and director for private interests, for the interests of the State of Maryland are in the stock which she holds, except so far as regards the interest she has and her people have as one part of the body of the people of the United States.

It is of no consequence therefore whether my friend is a director, representing the stock of the Democratic gentlemen who sit on the other side of the Chamber or of Republicans who sit on this side or any other citizens of the United States, or whether he represents the stock owned by all the citizens of Maryland as represented in its governor or in its treasurer or in whomsoever's name the stock stands. But, I repeat I only allude to that to show, as my friend has referred to Vermont, how he may be inspired to perhaps something of exaggeration brought about by the particular and local circumstances under which we exist.

Now I will come to Vermont. In the State of Vermont, so far as I know or believe, there is only one line of railroad track that is in any way controlled by any foreign corporation whatever, and that is that part—in all about 20 miles, or, I should say, from 20 to 30 miles, certainly not over 30—of the Grand Trunk line from Montreal to Portland, in the State of Maine, which nearly thirty years ago was built across the very northeast corner of the State of Vermont, a then almost entirely unsettled region of forest land, to enable that line to get from Canada into the State of Maine under a charter which was granted, as all our charters are required to be granted, to citizens of Vermont as a corporation, and it required, unless the laws have recently been changed, that the majority of its directors should be citizens and residents of that State.

It is perfectly true that that Canadian railway, the Grand Trunk Line, is really the controller of that road. The Vermont citizenship and the Vermont directorship practically amount to nothing. I certainly do not wish to disguise it or palliate it; that is the fact everywhere. Wherever in a State one line of railway wishes to get control of another means of communication and has the capital to do it, it employs its capital and gets a corporation of citizens of the other State organized and they make their arrangements of leasing the corporation or whatever, and the control is just where it was before in the one State; and that is true in Maryland as it is in Massachusetts or New York or New Jersey or Pennsylvania. We all know it, and there is no help for it; neither the Republican party nor the Democratic party can interfere with the private business interests of men or their public spirit so far as concern the dominion where they have a right to apply themselves—dominions that grant charters of incorporation either to one person as they can in California, or to everybody as they do in California, or to a combination of a hundred people as they do in Vermont. That, therefore, may be laid out of the case.

But I will add as to Vermont that for every one of those 20 or 30 miles of that foreign railroad in the State of Vermont controlled by a foreign corporation, there are 50 miles, I think I should be safe in saying 100 miles, of railway in the Dominion of Canada that are controlled by the Vermont corporations, and that are feeders for our lines and for New York and Pennsylvania and New England. It depends on the enterprise of the people, upon the capital they have, and what they want to do. So much for Vermont.

My friend from Maine, when he comes in, can explain how the matter stands in Maine. That is the end of the small share in this local business that Vermont has. Now I come, Mr. President, to the more general question. I suppose there is one other thing that may be taken as true on both sides of the Chamber without my friend from Maryland suspecting me or anybody else on this side of being intensely partisan about it, and that is that the physical geography of the globe can not be changed either by the St. Louis or the Chicago platform or by President Cleveland or his successor, President Harrison. The round globe will be just where it is, and if it is 500 miles shorter from Japan to Liverpool in a line across Canada by the borders of Hudson's Bay, it will remain 500 miles shorter, and without going through our country; and if it is 300 miles shorter than it is by way of New York by going through our country, it will be 300 miles shorter.

The globe will stay just where it is. We can not change the physical geography of this globe, and if it turns out to be cheaper to carry goods from Yokohama or Hong Kong to Liverpool by this route through Canada we can not stop it. It has even been proposed to build a line from Hudson's Bay which will make it nearly 1,000 miles shorter. That would seem to be a totally preposterous proposition on account of the climate, but it is seriously proposed; it is mentioned in one of the very English reviews that my honorable friend has referred to as a grand scheme, and it is said that the Canadian Government has really had a public ship up there making surveys and soundings with reference to building a short line of railroad from the west side of Hudson's Bay straight west to connect at the nearest point with the line for the Pacific coast, so as to make a still shorter line by, I think, 1,100 miles from Liverpool; but there is your physical geography, and with your physical geography is the physical condition of the climate of the globe that no party and no government can change.

I believe, therefore, that my honorable friend did immensely wrong when he said that this Canadian Pacific line, whether it goes through Maine or whether it does not, the Canadian Pacific line that extends west from the northern part of Lake Huron to the Pacific coast, can ever compete with any American line except that it competes at a loss and goes to ruin or is aided by its Government, as it is. There are seven months in the year when, at whatever risk, the actual cost of transporting a million chests of tea or a million boxes of silk from the eastern coast of Asia to the eastern coast of the Atlantic, whether it be Halifax, or Portland, or Boston, or Baltimore, or Savannah, will not be one-half by way of American lines that it is by the other; and when you add to that as a growing concern of fact that your American lines are, every one of them, capable of doing and are doing an immense local business, that a prosperous, industrious population furnishing the material and the means of railroad employment has been built up along them and is building up every day, any American citizen who flushes himself in this Presidential campaign into a great fever on the subject of competition as against American interests of these Canadian lines for Asiatic business is falling into an immense delusion.

It is true that so long as the money can be found to run at a loss and to carry goods at half what it costs to do it, and with no local business ever capable of being built up to help it, just so long, like the cutting of rates between the great trunk lines in our country when they carry for half cost, they will get the patronage of everybody who has anything to send and to whom it is convenient to send that way. That is human nature; but somebody has got to foot the bill, and those who foot the bill will stand the loss, and so long as the British Government or the Canadian Government think that for their great political interests it is desirable to build up these lines and pay for them, so be it; that is their affair; we can not help it; but it must be said, as the Senator has intimated in a very small degree, that the contrast between Government encouragement and assistance of the enterprise and the commerce and the trade and the manufactures of Great Britain and her colonies to that of the United States is very great.

As he says, they subsidize railways, they subsidize steam-ships; they establish colonies; they establish confidence, and they promote trade. They resent and get reparation for wrong to their subjects instantly. The Government of the United States, as at present constituted, does not do so. The Senate of the United States has year after year endeavored in some small degree, not half what it ought to have done, to promote American interests by the Nicaragua Canal, which will command the trade of the globe, railroad or no railroad. It has endeavored to stimulate South American and other commerce by the smallest of mail subsidies to steam-ships, and the Democratic House of Representatives says no and the Democratic Senators in the mass say no.

There are some honorable and patriotic exceptions. I do not mean to impute a want of patriotism to those who voted the other way; they voted according to what they think. The Democratic President says no, and he takes out of the hands of the Senate—it is a public fact I can state—the treaty which was to give us the Nicaragua Canal and allow us to be the masters of the world. And yet the Senator from Maryland stands up here and says we are partisans on this side and they are patriots all on the other. If I were to quote somebody, I should say:

O Shame, where is thy blush?

That is the undeniable history, not half stated now, because I do not intend to take the time to state it. That is where we have stood as parties; and when we come to a later event, referring to the treaties affecting Canadian and American affairs, the Senator has intimated that the divisions of the Senate as they appear in the debate—we have had no vote yet on the fisheries business—are partisans on this side, not on that. And yet it is not eighteen months ago—too long, I suppose, for anybody on the other side to remember it—that this Senate, unanimously, taking in the patriots with the partisans over here, on the yeas and nays, stood up for American rights and directed the President what he ought to do, and gave him the power to do it. But eighteen months afterwards, now, the British lion has opened its mouth, as the Irish phrase is, and as the Senators on the other side appear to hope, is to swallow us all by making a new treaty which is still better for British interests than any we have had before; and yet it is we who are alleged to be partisans, although we stand on the same ground that we did only eighteen months ago, and it is they who have reversed their position. That is enough, I think, for the present as to the partisanship matter.

Let us see a little further how this matter stands. The Senator says that the act of 1866, passed by a Republican Congress, as it was, and voted for, as I believe, by what few Democrats there were in it in both branches, there having been no party division, has been injurious to American rights in respect of allowing the Canadians to cross the Niagara River, and so on. My belief is—but I speak under reserve, for I have not examined the matter, and have forgotten about it in detail—my belief is that until the present Democratic Administration came in the construction put upon the act of 1866 was quite more favorable to American interests and less favorable to British interests than that which the late Mr. Manning acted upon under the advice of a Democratic law officer of the Government, probably one of the civil-service reform Democrats, the question to whom being under the civil-service Democratic commission would be whom he last voted for, how much he contributed, and how many votes he was able to—I was about to use a very impolite expression—I will say to obtain for his candidate.

That is where we stand on the act of 1866, in my humble opinion, with great respect to everybody else. The construction that Mr. Manning's Democratic law officer has put upon that act is incorrect. But, as usual, where there is a doubt upon a statute under this Administration, that doubt is always solved in favor of the foreigner, not because the Administration loves the foreigner, but on account of the generosity of its disposition, its love of human mercy and human nature, it always makes the point against its own people and gives the benefit of the doubt to the others. Well, when free trade comes in, as the world is all one family and we have no questions of home concern at all, of course that will be a most useful and Christian and capital idea to act upon; but in the present condition of the world, when it is supposed that a government has something to do peculiarly attached to the interests of the people that it is created to govern, it is going a little too far, to speak with great modesty on that subject, I think. So much for the act of 1866.

Now we come to the treaty of 1871, which is just as clear as anything can be, open to be revoked by either party on a certain notice, that gave to the railways and other business interests of the United States the right to carry goods across Canada from one place in the United States to another in unbroken packages, in sealed cars, and so on, convenient transit to American interests in the State of New York, particularly the great railway and business and commercial systems of that State, and, of course, correlatively, of the States west of Canada. Michigan, Illinois, and the whole Northwest found it convenient to carry their goods across the southern part of Western Canada as the shortest and cheapest line of transportation between New York and the Northwest. One line of the railroads that was built to carry that traffic, like the Grand Trunk line in Maine on the other hand, was built by American capital and is controlled by American power at this very moment. I refer to the Canada Southern road. American interest, American investment, American enterprise did in Canada exactly what the Grand Trunk people—the British Government really, because they furnished the money; the Grand Trunk line is a losing concern to-day standing on its own bottom; it can not pay interest on a cent of its stock; it is a continual contribution from the home government that keeps it alive and makes it a going concern—they did exactly what the Grand Trunk line did, carry across Maine Canadian goods to the sea and from Canada to their own ports.

That was reciprocal. It appeared to be fair. When it comes to be for the interest of the people of the United States to abolish all that both in Maine and in Southern Canada, I say amen. I do not know that the time has come; I incline to think it has, and I believe it will be better for the people of the United States on the whole, Vermont or no Vermont, Central Vermont Railway or no Central Vermont Railway, if every pound of American goods that passes from one part of the United States to another passes always within the lines of our own country, and I will agree to-day with my honorable friend from Maryland to see to it that the general interest is preserved whatever may be the local interest of Maryland or Vermont or Maine or Michigan.

The only thing is to ascertain whether the time has come to do it. But the time has not come to do it, in my opinion, for the reason stated by my friend; that is to say, the reason that this new trans-continental line, almost within the borders of the frozen zone and really within the borders of seven months of almost impracticable transportation, is a menace to the prosperity of our commerce. It is British money and British power coming from their treasury and their capitalists for wider objects than mere Canada, but to put the circle around the globe for all their possessions, that leads them to this lavish expenditure. If we should act correspondingly for our interests in the ways I have suggested (and as we in this body have tried over and over again to do and have been defeated by gentlemen on the other side and their coadjutors elsewhere), we should not stand even in the present state of temporary embarrassment where we are. That is all I have to say.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I have been a member of the Senate for some years, and I have been associated with it in various capacities from my earliest childhood. No man in this country has a higher respect for this body than I have. No Senator has ever heard me utter a word that reflected upon any brother Senator.

In what little I have had to say I have tried to discuss the question that was before the Senate, and therefore there can be no earthly excuse for the Senator from Vermont, whose learning and ability are respected and recognized by all, in the personal allusion that he has made to me in this connection, except that he has revived the methods used when he practiced in the lower courts before he came into the Senate—long before he reached a higher atmosphere both in law and in statesmanship—that he learned when he had no case before the court to abuse his opponent. I know of no other reason why he should have made that personal allusion to myself.

In what I said I referred to no individual and to no party. I do not intend to say more about my personal relations, because they are public and represent the public interest.

The Senator from Vermont should have been the last member of this Senate, under the circumstances, to refer to the connection of any of his brother Senators with business or railroad enterprises. He himself may not be a director representing a public or a private interest.

I have never charged him with it. I have said to him, what is true of every man, that possibly the local interests of his State had warped his judgment. That is true of us all. I made no personal reference to him. I did not allude to the fact that as a great lawyer and advocate, while discussing here and determining great questions as an adviser to the President, his business relations, with his time and his services, had been taken and paid for by great corporations in the country. That does not make any difference to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Maryland be allowed to go on.

Mr. CULLOM. I also ask that the Senate consent to the disposition of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside to enable the Senate to continue the consideration of the pending resolution. It is so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. GORMAN. Now, Mr. President, that is not the way for Senators to treat each other on this floor. There is a school of hypocrites, Pharisees, that has grown up in this country, coming from both parties, who have through the public press and on the rostrum and wherever opportunity has offered, traduced public men and intimated that they were controlled by corrupt or bad or personal motives.

It has gone on until I have sometimes thought that both Houses of Congress have cowed under the charges of these men, whose reputation does not compare with that of the Senator from Vermont, or mine, or that of any other gentleman on this floor. I say to the Senator that he is doing an injustice to his party, he is doing this body an injustice, and it is an outrage upon the individual when he descends to that low plane. I think that we ought all of us, without partisanship, help to maintain the dignity of the body and the respect of its individual members. I hope never to be led into personalities while I am a member of this body. I do not believe that this is the theater for personalities and low personal flings.

As to the Senator from Vermont, I referred to him because of his standing in his party. He is the great leader of his party; he is recognized here as the one authority, the organ of the party, to correct, by introducing such bills as may be necessary, any inequalities in the law, to make provision for any discrimination against American interests.

He is the one man who, until very recently, of all others in this body, Democrat or Republican, in looking at these great questions and determining them as between this and other governments, has taken, I think I may take the liberty to say, the broad and manly view, the American view, the one that has lasted from the foundations of the Government until now, when (so he has been reported in the papers to have said), no man could think of taking your enemies into public consultation when you are determining a question which affected their and your interests.

So long as he stood upon that ground as an American, so long as, the leader of his great party, he held to the traditions of the past and the only rule under which we ought to discuss affairs with a foreign nation, I respected his judgment, but when he fell from that pedestal down to the political—I will not say mire—but to the political level of his party, so that he might have an opportunity to excite opposition to the President and to give him opportunity to proclaim on the floor of the Senate who is to be Mr. Cleveland's successor, when he is ready, as he seems to be, to jeopardize our interest with another government merely to aid him and his party, he has lost a part of his Americanism.

Now, the Senator from Vermont says that the act of 1866, under which this decision was made, has been improperly construed by Democratic officials. It is the identical construction that has been given since the passage of the act. The only difference is that the constituents of my friend from Oregon and the constituents of the Senator from California organized on the Pacific Ocean an American line of steamers, no politics in their organization, as I understand, and they came to the Treasury Department to bond their goods and to be permitted to ship them through over the Canadian Pacific. The law officers of the Government under a Democratic administration said: "Yes; we have given the same rights to every other transportation line in the United States, and we will give it to you men on the Pacific."

There may have been something said about it in the Treasury Department, for we Democrats take great pride in the fact that we acquired that territory when the Democratic administration controlled every branch of the Government. We made it possible for you to become a part of the Union, and we wish to encourage your enterprise out there and make you feel as if you really belonged to the United States; and it is a matter of pride that the first war-ship that ever floated on the Pacific, built of American material and by American workmen, was built under a Democratic administration.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland under what administration it was that Great Britain acquired the territory between 49° and 54° 40′?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts and all of us know from our school-books as to that. He can not take me off on that line.

Mr. HOAR. I can not get you north of 49°.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Vermont says that the construction of the act of 1866 was all wrong; that a Democratic official had given a construction broader than had been given before and against the American interests; and yet the Senator from Vermont, the leader of his party, if he will permit me to say so (he gets almost everything he wants; he is an autocrat here, with power to pass almost any measure he wants, certainly the power to pass any measure that affects alone the great interests of this country)—there he has been as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the organ of this body, the one man we all look to in such matters, and he has been silent since 1885 until the fisheries treaty came here. There has been no attempt on his part to correct this inequality, this mistake, if it be a mistake.

The House of Representatives, he says, is Democratic. That is true. In the discussion and consideration of other great measures they have not taken up this question, because it belongs here. Here it has been since December, or early in the session. This question coming up under this treaty which is under discussion, has brought the whole matter before the public. So far as I know, my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is always diligent and anxious to look after this interest, is the only member of this body—and he, I think, is not a member of the Judiciary Committee—who has called the attention of the Senate to it, and therefore the responsibility, if there is any in this body, centers upon my friend from Vermont. "No guilty man shall escape."

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I think I have secured pretty well so far as the Senate is concerned a development of this subject, probably to the advantage of the country. I introduced the resolution and made the remarks which I did, utterly ignoring any question of partisanship whatever. I have not regarded it as a party question and do not now; but I do insist that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States, especially of this Senate, to make the investigation that is indicated in the resolution, and so far as I am concerned I propose, while I am a member of the Senate, to do whatever I may be able to do to protect the interests of the American people against the encroachments of the Canadian people or Government or any other outside power.

Now, Mr. President, so far as this subject is concerned, I believe it has not been before the Senate since I have been a member of it until now. I have been engaged, as the Senate knows, a considerable portion of my time since I have been here in the investigation of the question of regulating commerce in the United States, and under the Constitution of the United States. The Committee on Interstate Commerce at the present session heard a very distinguished gentleman of our country, General Wilson, a citizen of Delaware, upon this question of the encroachment by the Canadian people and Government upon American commerce. The committee had its attention called to this subject directly, and it has seemed to me that it was the duty of the Congress of the United States to take hold of the question and ascertain exactly what ought to be done with reference to the subject.

I want to say now that so far as I am concerned I shall continue to do whatever my judgment indicates is necessary to be done to protect American people and American commerce as against the people of other nations or provinces; and if it is necessary in order to protect the American people that the flag of the American nation shall float over Canada, I will be in favor of that. Let us see exactly what our rights are under treaty obligations, and if the treaty of 1871 is in the way of giving protection, let us take steps to abrogate it at the earliest moment.

I hope, Mr. President, that there may be unanimous consent given to dispense with the rule requiring the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and that it may be adopted now by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] asks unanimous consent to suspend a rule.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator asks for unanimous consent I will delay what I was about to propose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the rule of the Senate which requires a resolution making a charge upon the contingent fund to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate may be in this case suspended in order that the resolution may be acted upon now. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration——

Mr. CULLOM. Let my resolution be adopted first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent or move to proceed to its consideration?

Mr. HOAR. I move.

Mr. STEWART. Will not that displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will displace the unfinished business. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by him, which will be read.

Mr. STEWART. I object to displacing the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This motion will displace the regular order if it be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

Mr. COKE. I object.

Mr. HOAR. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. HOAR:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the hour for the daily meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let us have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK (when his name was called). I will announce my pair for the day with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] for the day. He has been called home. I make the announcement, which will hold good for to-day. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is paired with my colleague [Mr. DOLPH], who is still detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is absent and is paired generally with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. If he were here, my colleague would vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] calls the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to the absence of his colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas].

Mr. BERRY. My colleague is absent, and is generally paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I had not observed that he was absent. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon withdraws his vote.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired.

Mr. BECK. I announced my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent, however, and I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine to him, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] is absent, and I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from Indiana, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the vote was on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate having decided to proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COKE. I offer the following amendment to the resolution:

And the hour for adjournment shall be at 5.30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that is a change of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator indicate the rule that would be changed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an addition to the rules by adding that much. The standing rule is that the daily hour of meeting shall be 12 o'clock m., unless otherwise ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not a rule; it is an order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But still it is a rule all the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not technically speaking. The Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to raise the point of order under the rules that the motion to amend by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] was not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was my point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Chair asked the Senator to state what rule of the Senate it would violate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought it was the rule, for I did not know the difference between an order and a rule, but I think it is a rule nevertheless. In my mind that does not make any difference. The rule only provides for changing the daily hour of meeting; and to fix the daily hour of adjournment would be to change the standing rules and orders—I did not know that there was any difference, I confess—by fixing a permanent law which does not now exist. What we are now doing is acting under a permanent law of the Senate, whether you call it a rule or an order, which authorizes us to change a particular thing, and that is the hour of meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts would be out of order. The Chair thinks that the hour of meeting is fixed on the first day of the session by the adoption of an order, that until otherwise ordered the Senate shall meet at 12 o'clock. The rules are silent both about the time of meeting and the time of adjournment, and the Chair would be glad to have his attention called to any rule of the Senate which is violated by the proposed amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair indulge me in one observation? It seems to me that the resolution offered by me would not be out of order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so hold.

Mr. HOAR. Even under the view of the Senator from Vermont, because the standing order is "until otherwise ordered," which implies the authority of the Senate to make an order at any time. Of course if it be by resolution it will go over one day, as this resolution has done. I hope the Senator from Vermont, instead of raising this very doubtful question of order, which I investigated before I offered the resolution, will allow the question to be settled by a motion to lay the amendment on the table. It is obvious that it would be absolutely destructive to all control of the Senate over its business to have an iron rule fixing the hour for adjourning. You can never complete anything if it is in the power of anybody by simply keeping up until 5 o'clock to destroy the day. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to modify my amendment. I ask permission——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The Senator from Texas appeals to the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his motion to enable him to modify his proposed amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I will do that.

Mr. COKE. I desire to modify my amendment so as to fix the time of adjournment at 5 o'clock instead of 5.30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed modification will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution:

And that the daily hour of adjournment shall be at 5 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Speaking upon the point of order, the Chair knows of no reason why the Senate has not the same right to fix the hour for the termination of its sessions as it has to fix the hour of their commencement. There is nothing that the Chair knows, either in the rules or in the nature of things, which would prevent the Senate from controlling by an order the hour when its daily adjournment should occur. But the Senator from Massachusetts moves to lay the amendment on the table. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COKE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I have transferred my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], and therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but I will take the liberty of voting "yea" upon this question, believing that he would so vote if he were here.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. PADDOCK'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN. I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Hiscock,	Sherman,
Blair,	Evarts,	Hoar,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Ingalls,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Frye,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,

Dawes,	Hawley,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—23.

So Mr. COKE'S amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that Senate bill 788 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a certain bill.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire merely to have the bill indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know that it would make any material difference, but I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to change the phrase "until otherwise ordered" to "unless otherwise ordered;" so that at any time when the Senate may desire to change the hour of meeting it can do so without having to introduce a resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The two phrases mean precisely the same thing.

Mr. HOAR. I do not see any distinction, but if the Senator likes the phrase he suggests better, I have no objection to that change.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it would not be subject to the objection I stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the power of a majority of the Senate at any time, notwithstanding the passage of the resolution, to adjourn upon any day until 12 o'clock on the following day.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to tie up the Senate myself in that respect.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri insist on the proposed change?

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 6619) for the relief of Eliza A. Cutler Jones;

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8310) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Wallace military reservation in Kansas, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. WASHINGTON, and Mr. TURNER of Kansas, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with. The Executive Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britian concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, since the discussion of this question commenced in open session there has been a good deal said on the part of those who favor the ratification of the treaty about the partisan character of the opposition to it, and when on our part we retort that the friends of the treaty on the other side are moved by the same considerations, when we read the record which we think justifies us in the assertion, we are charged at once with an unfair attack upon our associates in this Chamber.

The first discussion of this question in open session occurred, if I am not mistaken, on the 7th day of June of this year, when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, addressed the Senate. It was the Senator from Alabama who first made a charge that Senators on this floor were actuated by the desire to make political capital; and yet later, on at least two occasions, the Senator from Alabama has complained of the unfair treatment he is receiving at the hands of his associates, because the charge had been made on this side that the support of the treaty is mainly derived from the fact that the Senators who defend it are anxious to support the Administration, and not because of the merit of the treaty.

When the Senator from Alabama addressed the Senate on the 7th of June he said:

I am glad to know that no political party ever before attempted thus to impose upon a question of foreign policy the embarrassments of domestic party politics. It rejoices me to find that the party that would attempt to do such a thing makes this broad confession that all its other policies have failed to engage the confidence of the people. In its wild distress it thus addresses itself to the task of doing what it hopes will enable it to regain power by a united appeal to a supposed restless desire of our people for strife and war and to old resentments towards Great Britain, recently intensified amongst our Irish population by the conduct of that Government towards their friends in Ireland. The party that made this decree in its caucus, that this treaty should neither be amended nor ratified, feels the sad need of a new issue for its campaign.

They need another issue where prejudice can set free the tongue of clamor until the voice of reason can not be heard.

Later, in the same connection, he said:

The Senate, in the effort to sit in supreme judgment upon the situation of the country, and to force it into an attitude that no other branch of the Government recognizes, should find some safe and undeniable ground for its lofty isolation and some more cogent reason than the political solicitudes and aversions that have marked all the proceedings thus far upon this treaty, and that are so obvious in the critiques, the irony, the disparagement, the bad temper, and the scarcely-concealed contempt which the report unjustly loads upon the President.

Again:

This case had been hauled before the country in the period of an eager canvass for the Presidency, doubtless with a view to exciting the antagonism of Irish voters against the present Administration, because of its alleged subserviency to British influence, and it is asserted this treaty proves the fact.

The Senator from Alabama having first made this charge, he ought not to be surprised, in view of his record (which I think it is perfectly proper to present to the Senate as I intend to do) that I should retort from our side that we have not changed our attitude upon this subject at all, and that only a short time ago he was with us in sentiment by his voice and by his vote. Every Democratic Senator save one who has discussed this subject has charged the Republican majority of the Senate as being moved by improper motives in their opposition to this treaty. The only exception that I recollect now is the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who first addressed us on this subject. I do not now recollect, and I listened with great care to his remarks, that he made any such insinuation or any such charge.

So far as I am concerned I am disposed to concede to my associates on this floor as much patriotism as I claim for myself. I do not think because the Senators have allowed themselves to be cajoled into the belief that party success or some other reason should carry them to the support of this treaty it necessarily follows that they are lacking in patriotism. I propose to find some other reasons for them than a lack of patriotism. I have never charged that they are not as careful of their oaths as we are. Yet we were told in substance by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who subsequently addressed the Senate, that we were not administering upon this treaty under the sanction of our oaths. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who subsequently addressed the Senate, also charged upon us the same thing. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] who addressed the Senate also charged that we were guilty of not treating this proposition for an amendment of the old treaty, as he said, with proper consideration, and that we were moved solely by a desire to further our political ends and to enhance and increase the success of the Republican party.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who first addressed the Senate upon this subject, does not deny that there were some things in his speeches in the Senate in 1886 and 1887 which at least give color to the charge that he has changed his attitude upon this subject, but he says in substance that he did not feel at liberty, the Senate then and there being in open session, to make a full and complete statement of what was in his mind as to our rights under the treaty of 1818; that he was then dealing in the open Senate and he was restrained from expressing his true sentiments. He was dealing with the American Senate and with the American people, and we had a right to suppose that the Senator expressed to us his whole mind upon the subject and that he had retained nothing. If he had desired to say more to us he knew then, as he knows to-day, that upon his suggestion any Senator on that side or on this side, if he had something that was proper to say in secret session, would have joined with him when he presented the matter to the Senate; and it only requires two Senators to close the doors.

He knows there never has been a case discussed in open Senate that when the doors have been closed a Senator so desiring has not been allowed to communicate to the Senate with closed doors what he did not care to communicate to the Senate with open doors.

So the Senator can hardly escape the conclusion we drew, that for some reason he changed his mind. The Senator says he has a right to do so. I do not complain when a Senator changes his mind. I do not find any fault with the fact that the Senator to-day supports what he before declared was not at all necessary. I do not find any fault because of the fact that he and his associates on that side of the Chamber occupy an entirely different position from what they occupied before. They have an undoubted right so to do, if circumstances have changed their views upon the subject.

What I complain of, and what I complained of when I had the floor a few days since, is that they charge on us, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] did to-day, that this is the most disgraceful exhibition which has ever been seen in the American Senate; that we are simply as partisans here before the country attempting to find fault with a treaty that we know was in fact a proper treaty to be made. I find fault because this matter is exactly what it was two years and a half ago, what it was a year and a half ago, when it came before the Senate, while the condition of the Democratic minority is exactly the reverse of what it was on other occasions.

I propose to submit some of the remarks made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] when he addressed the Senate in 1886. I know the Senator said in his speech yesterday:

So I appreciate the reserve under which Senators have been compelled to debate the resolutions and bills relating to this subject that we have been compelled to consider and discuss. I will not resort to the stratagem, which I consider immeasurably mean, unworthy, and unjust, of holding a Senator who spoke on these subjects in 1887 to his responsibility for utterances in which he did not dare to expose the secret counsels of his colleagues or even to state fully and frankly his own opinions, lest he might betray his country into some unfortunate attitude.

He said the other day that if I had as high appreciation of my position as a Senator as I ought to have, and as he thought I did not have, I would not expose the weakness of the Government in a certain transaction, referring, I suppose, by way of illustration, to the treaty with Mexico. I deny that there was any restraint put on the Senator from Alabama. I deny that that discussion did not take the broadest field that it was possible to take. The Senator went into it as fully and completely as he could have done in executive session. He might have been restrained from saying things he might have said as to the character of Great Britain, or her methods of diplomacy, or something of that kind, but he presented every fact which he could have presented with reference to this treaty. At least he reached the conclusion that we came to, precisely as we did.

The Senator does not seem to be in the Chamber at this moment. I do not want to read any extracts from the Senator's speech that will do him injustice. I do not care, of course, to read the whole speech. If the Senator himself on his return, or if any Senator, thinks I have done him injustice I will read any portion that should accompany what I shall read; but I shall endeavor to read enough to make it apparent to the Senate that the Senator did not at that time favor a new treaty, but that at the time he entertained the idea that there was no necessity for a treaty, and that was the whole intention and purpose of the Senate when it passed upon the question by its vote on what was called the Frye resolution.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] had addressed the Senate on the subject. Then the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said:

In listening to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, and also in what investigation I have been able to give this subject, I am unable to ascertain that there is really an unsettled question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the fisheries of the northeastern coast. I have inquired of Senators who have had long experience in the diplomatic affairs of the country, to ascertain, if I could, whether there was any open question of damages, any claim of damages arising between the Governments respectively out of any supposed breach of our fisheries treaties or our fisheries laws; and I can hear nothing of that kind. The Halifax Commission seems to have settled for good and all every controversy, sounding in damages at least, which has been promoted or urged by the citizens of the countries on either side.

Those considerations out of view, the next question would be whether there is any want of certainty in our treaty relations with Great Britain upon this subject. I conceive that there is no want of certainty in our treaty relations, and there is scarcely room for a difference in interpretation of what our treaty relations actually are. The two treaties which have settled the actual and what we might term the permanent rights of the people of the United States and of the Dominion country in regard to the fisheries are the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Then, after some other remarks, he adds:

So that the field is entirely clear in respect of the actual state of treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain, and those treaty relations rest upon the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Now, the question arises, of course, whether the treaty of 1783 has been entirely superseded by the treaty of 1818, and I believe that the better opinion of the publicists and of those who have been officially connected with the discussion of this subject, on our side at least, is that all the rights we acquired under the treaty of 1783 were repeated in a different form in the treaty of 1818; and when we wish to know what are the real treaty rights of the people of the United States in respect of these fisheries we go to that treaty and to no other place.

Skipping much that he said of the same general character, he proceeded:

A broader right of fishery than that can not be conceived of; no restriction or restraint upon it at all, except that in conducting their business they should not trespass or intrude on private property on the shore in drawing their fish or mending their nets or whatever other use they might have for the shore.

Then he quotes a portion of the treaty of 1818. Now comes the part we yielded, the renunciation. After quoting that, he says:

That I consider the treaty foundation in regard to the fisheries between the United States and Great Britain. It seems to me a very clear one. I can scarcely understand how it is the subject of misconstruction or misunderstanding at all. It will be observed that in this proviso the language employed and the evident purpose of it was to extend to our fishermen a peculiar privilege in the bays, harbors, inlets, and creeks into which they might resort, in favor of our fishermen.

He continued in the same strain for some time, and added:

There is nothing in that article which I have just read to indicate that the fishermen of the United States were considered in any sense a piratical people, or a people who were intruding upon the rights of the people of the British-American provinces; that their traffic was in any sense an unlawful traffic or injurious to the people with whom we traded. On the contrary, this very privilege and license of entering into their bays was given to us for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the people along the coast of the British possessions.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] called his attention to a point, and said:

Mr. GRAY. I want to ask if the Senator's construction of that proviso is quite as broad as he has just stated, and whether under it all American fishermen are not excluded from the bays, harbors, etc., except for four purposes—shelter, repairing damages, purchasing wood, and obtaining water? And then does not the last clause, "and for no other purpose whatever," negative any idea that there was any privilege to take bait or to carry on a general trading venture?

To that the Senator from Alabama replied:

Mr. MORGAN. At that time it did certainly negative the idea of carrying on a trading venture, carrying on general commerce with that people in 1818.

Mr. GRAY. I call the Senator's attention to the force of the last clause, "and for no other purpose whatever."

Mr. MORGAN. I have that in my mind. I repeat that this was a privilege guarantied to our fishermen as one of the benefits of the concession which we made in giving up the rights we had under the treaty of 1783, and it was a right that no commercial vessel of the United States at that time enjoyed, for no commercial vessel of the United States at that time could enter a Canadian harbor for any purpose, unless it might be driven in by stress of weather and might throw itself on the general hospitality of the people under the laws of nations; but there was no legislative right to go there guarantied to us by the Government of Great Britain, and there was no treaty provision, and therefore we had nothing to go on.

I will express the conviction again that this proviso in the treaty was a large indulgence to our fishermen far beyond that enjoyed by any of the commercial vessels of the United States, and was so intended. It was a restrictive advantage, I grant you, but still the only one that was enjoyed by any class of vessels of the United States at that time.

I think, perhaps, I had better read the whole of his remarks following, so that I may not be charged with garbling:

As I remarked before, afterward the policy of Great Britain changed, and she began to open up the trade of her colonies to us; first the East Indies, then the West Indies, and after a while she came around and opened up her North American possessions to us for general traffic. That was done entirely by statute, various enactments moving on the general line until the final enactment, made at a time almost contemporaneous with our laws on the same subject, opened the ports of the British possessions in America freely to our ships of commerce, our vessels of every kind. Those statutes do not discriminate against fishermen, nor do they discriminate in favor of vessels engaged in commerce other than fishing vessels. It is a broad, sweeping statute of Great Britain, admitting our vessels of whatever kind or character freely into those ports, whereupon, or at least almost contemporaneously with it, we passed a law of a similar character permitting British vessels to come here. Every vessel of the United States is included in that privilege granted by British law, without exception and without qualification. Every vessel that has a register or an enrollment under the flag of the United States, and that has papers which authorize that ship to go to sea for traffic, is a vessel that may go into any Canadian port to do anything that any other ship may do there.

The treaty of 1818 is totally perverted in its application to this state of the case. A certain class of the provincial lawyers seem to assume that the treaty of 1818 gives to the fishermen the only rights they have got, and because those rights are restricted in the treaty therefore they can not do anything except what the treaty itself conferred upon them the power to do, when the fact is that the British statute, making no discrimination against them at all, permits them to go in equally with all the vessels of commerce of every kind and character that go into their ports.

Now, why should we take a class of vessels that in the treaty of 1818 had this great beneficial arrangement made in their favor, a class of vessels that were encouraged to trade in the British possessions, and when a general law is passed, without any discrimination against them, you presume to hold that that class of vessels, which were originally favored and have never met with disfavor at all, are excluded from the effects of this law because there was a treaty in 1818, in which they got a certain privilege or favor in advance of the rights of commercial ships? It reverses the whole theory of proper construction of the existing arrangements between the Government of the United States and Great Britain. The question between us and the British Government is whether or not they have any law that excludes a fishing ship from their ports. They have no law that excludes a fishing ship from their ports; they have not put it into any statute. If they had done any such thing as that, their fishermen would not have been buying fish and recruiting their crews and getting their supplies, everything of that kind, in our harbors. We passed a law for the purpose of conferring upon the British people an equivalent in right to that which they had conferred upon our fishermen. Their own people construed their law by coming here. They are here every day. They are in the ports of the Northeast to-day buying their bait and their supplies and trafficking with our people at will and pleasure.

The Senator continued in the same strain. I do not find that there was any restraint upon him. I do not find that he did not speak frankly and freely as to our rights. Speaking, then, of our fishermen going into those ports, he said:

That is no violation of any law of Great Britain, and certainly not a violation of the treaty of 1818.

Why is it, let me ask, that a ship that goes in there with all the tackle necessary for fishing for mackerel, but being a purely commercial ship, not having a crew shipped for the purpose of fishing, not having any fishermen aboard, can go into one of the ports of the British possessions, buy what it chooses to buy, and go out again without obstruction; and yet if a fisherman goes in there, a man whose business it is to fish, he is condemned if he undertakes to buy anything but wood and water or claim anything but shelter? The argument is not reasonable; it is not a proper construction of the British law; and when we have said that we have said all that can be said about it. If there was no law but the treaty of 1818, then our fishermen could not go there, except for shelter, for wood, and for water, but the British Government has enlarged that by granting to us the commercial privilege in a sense of reciprocity for certain like privileges that we have granted to them. That is the state of the law of this case.

If that be so, it seems to me there is no difficulty at all either in construing or in handling this matter. As I remarked before, I can not see that there is any difficulty in the construction of the treaty of 1818 taken by itself. All the rights that are guarantied there and that have not been enlarged by statute of Great Britain obtain, and there is no difficulty in the construction of them. There is no difficulty in the construction of the British statutes on this subject. But, then, we are not called upon to construe them. What we are called upon to do is to protect our people against any wrong construction that they may put upon their own laws, by a power that we reserve expressly in the hands of the President of the United States. That is, when the President of the United States is satisfied that the British people have legislated in hostility to our commerce or that they have construed their own laws in hostility to our commerce, we have the right to suspend intercourse with them either absolutely or partially. That power is given to the Executive, and he does it by proclamation. That is an indispensable power, for the reason that there is no diplomatist, no set of diplomatists who have ever lived who can arrange between themselves all the rights of the people of two different states or nations in respect of a subject that is so intricate, so involved, that has so many instances about it as this subject of conducting the fisheries.

Then he said:

I do not wish to volunteer any opinions about this subject before a question gets before the Senate and I am compelled to act upon it; but my convictions are very strong; they are fixed; indeed I may say that we can get along with the people of Great Britain on this subject without any further treaty at all and without any further legislation. If any one were to ask me what provision of a treaty I would frame to compose and settle any question of fundamental law between us and Great Britain in respect of the fisheries, I could not suggest it, or if I were asked to propose an amendment to the statutes of the United States so as to put the control of this intricate subject more completely in the hands of our own Government I could not frame the amendment to the statutes. I would not know how to do it. I believe that both the treaty stipulations and the situation under the statutes are about as complete as we are ever able to make them. There may be other interests, and there are other interests lying between the people of the British possessions and the United States that I would like very much indeed to see promoted by further negotiation, but I can not call to mind, there is no suggestion to my mind of, any improvement that we could make under existing conditions of our rights in the fisheries of the Northeastern coast.

Then the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] inquired as to his view upon the question of ice and bait. In reply the Senator from Alabama said:

Mr. MORGAN. It would hardly be expected, I think, that the diplomatic powers of two great governments should enter into a negotiation to determine the distinction between ice and bait on one side and bacon and flour on the other as articles of commerce; neither of them is mentioned in the treaty, but I should think it was unfortunate for the civilization of this age, especially I should think it unfortunate for the character of the publicists of this age, if they should find it necessary to interpret the meaning of ice and bait so as to exclude them within the commercial list, when everybody would admit that flour and bacon are included in the commercial list.

Whatever is legitimate traffic, whatever is not contraband, is lawful traffic in any port to which you have the lawful right of access; and if it is ice and bait it is just as much commerce as if it was flour and bacon. You can not claim ice and bait under the treaty, you can not claim flour and bacon under the treaty, but beyond question a merchant ship has the right to go there and buy flour and bacon and a fisherman has the right to go there and buy flour and bacon if also he is a commercial ship, for a fisherman may have two characters, and every one of them I believe has two characters. One is a business or vocation of catching fish, and the other is of dealing in freights or in merchandise, traffic, barter, or exchange just as they wish. We do not send any ships out of our ports, as I understand, exclusively, for the purpose of fishing, but we arm every one of them with a sea pass and give them the protection of an enrollment or a registry, so that they are American ships in every sense of the word and commercial ships in every sense of the word.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Maine says that right is denied, as I understand him. The right to buy bait and the right to buy ice is denied by the colonial authorities.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand that while it was denied by some of the British people there, the authorities of Great Britain are not denying it. At all events whenever it is authentically notified to the President of the United States that that right is denied, and he believes that is a right secured to us under the reciprocal advantages, as I will call them, of parallel legislation between the two countries, he has nothing to do but resort to that act of Congress and say, "I proclaim as President of the United States a suspension of trade until this matter is rectified."

Mr. GEORGE. He has that power under the law now.

Mr. President, this was before the act of 1887. This was in April, 1886. The Senator from Alabama proceeded:

Mr. MORGAN. He has that power now. I was speaking of the legal situation. I was trying to state to the Senate that I did not know how to improve it either in putting the matter to new negotiations to define our treaties, or in putting it to new legislation to define or to protect our rights. It would take a great deal of negotiation to go over the whole field and to prescribe everything that a fisherman might do and that any other class of ships might do. Therefore I think that the Government should leave the matter just where it is, and I do not think Congress can be persuaded to repeal the act. I have not heard yet from any source whatever a suggestion with regard to its amendment.

Mr. President, so far as I know that covers the whole case. With this view in my mind, I did not believe that it was necessary that the Congress of the United States should create a grand joint commission to negotiate about the matter.

Then he goes on to say that if the President of the United States thought proper he had the right independent of Congress to make such negotiations. That is what he now insists, and on that I do not propose to take any issue with him. I am free to admit that whatever the Senate may have said upon that subject the President of the United States has a right to proceed to negotiate, and when we have defeated this treaty, although we may have defeated it, as the Senator states, to give an understanding to the world that, so far as we are concerned, we think the time for negotiation is passed, yet we do not bind the Executive. On that subject he and I are not at variance. After some other things were said, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] made the following inquiry, to which I will read the response of the Senator from Alabama:

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator, is there not some danger, with the different interpretation of the rights of our fleets, of a collision being brought about?

Mr. MORGAN. I think there is; but I do not think we can relieve it by negotiation. I think we can relieve it by enforcing the law on both sides. I think there is some danger because there are enterprising citizens on both sides who would be willing to get up a fuss between the two countries.

Mr. GEORGE. May there not be something done to avoid it?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how you can do it unless by an arbitration law such as is proposed between the railroad companies and the strikers. If difficulty actually exists and is formulated by either government, then I should say that would lead to a negotiation of some kind for the purpose of relieving it. Irresponsible men as far as diplomacy is concerned, who are getting up these troubles, can not very well be restrained by our action.

Then the Senator from Alabama goes on and supposes a case:

I will suppose a case. I am not aware that it exists, but I will suppose that some of the Gloucester fishermen desire to intensify American feeling a good deal just at this time for the purpose of holding on to the existing tariff on fish, and knowing that some thick-headed official in some Canadian port would deny to them the right to buy a barrel of flour or a barrel of sugar or to buy bait or something else under the treaty of 1818, if we should go back to that, and the moment they go there and make the request, this official comes out and says, "If you do not leave these coasts in your piratical enterprise of buying ice from our people we will have you arrested." Thereupon the Yankee gets his back up because he started out to get it; there is a capture made; they take him into court, libel his ship, put an officer on board, take him into a provincial court and condemn him. I do not believe the provincial court has any jurisdiction of it under the treaty at all.

I call the attention of the Senate to that because this treaty confers upon the provincial courts of Canada and the courts of Great Britain the right to try the very questions of which the Senator says he does not believe the courts have jurisdiction. The Senator from Alabama proceeded as follows:

We can see that by a maneuver of this kind it is very easy to startle the American people, very easy to arouse them, and a speech against free bait made in the Senate of the United States with the background of a little flurry of that kind, by some smart fellow who went there for the purpose of getting up a row, would more than likely prevent any change of the duties on fish.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Mississippi asks me if there are not difficulties. I am expecting difficulties all the time, not between the governments, but I am expecting difficulties between private enterprising men who want to raise rows and whose business interests lie in the direction of getting up a fuss. I rather look for them, and I do not see any way in the world to prevent them unless we had some law on our statute-book which would punish a man for undertaking to bring his country into turmoil and discontent with other governments. But so far as I have heard yet in the matter of buying ice and buying bait and shipping crews, or buying anything else, our American fishermen have got a right to go there and get these things although they are fishermen, for that is conceded to them under British law.

Then he was asked by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]:

What in his opinion is the duty of the Government of the United States in the supposititious case which he puts, of a vessel having been seized for attempting to buy bait in a provincial port?

To which he replied as follows:

Mr. MORGAN. I think then it would be a good occasion for the Secretary of State to ascertain all the facts in the first place, and whether or not the Government of Great Britain espoused the cause of that official, and whether in making the espousal of his cause the Government of Great Britain violated its own plain laws or violated its laws as we understand them; and if the question grew into that magnitude that the Government of Great Britain had determined through the instrumentality of this man to inflict a wrong upon us as a people, I do not know where I would go. I know there is one direction I would not go; I would not back out of it. I would try to have it settled peaceably according to the American spirit.

The Senator from Alabama said later on:

Still I hope that the discussion of it will lead the people of Great Britain to understand that whatever rights we have under the treaty of 1818 we consider are perfectly clear, and what rights we have under the British statute we consider entirely clear, and that if we should unfortunately differ in our opinion with them about what our commercial rights are, we have the power in our own hands to rectify it; and that is the whole case.

That is in perfect keeping with what the Senator said in January, 1887, when the bill was before the Senate. The Senator is inclined to criticise our conduct in relation to the bill, and to say that we are endeavoring to get the President into difficulties. Yet he said then:

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee who reported this bill, and it received my cordial approbation. I was also a member of the subcommittee which formulated the bill, and it was carefully considered there in connection with the evidence which had been collected, not only from their own investigations under the order of the Senate, but also from the archives of the State Department as far as we had access to those archives.

He declared that it was the duty of Congress to arm the President with the authority which the statute did. In speaking of these transactions the Senator from Alabama spoke of them, in the language of the late Secretary of the Treasury, as being brutal methods. He also said:

There is no war in this measure. There is peace in it, and nothing else. But if we allow the existing condition to go on there will be war in it, and that beyond our control, for I must say that I applaud the spirit of those men who, knowing that their rights are interfered with; who, understanding that their rights are distinctly expressed by Mr. Phelps in this dispatch, by Mr. Bayard in his communications with the foreign office of Great Britain and with Mr. West, by the Senate of the United States, and by Congress in various legislative acts and resolutions; by President Grant in his message of 1870, by the concurrent opinion of almost every American statesman—knowing that they are right, have been emphatically clear in their self-restraint.

But these men will at last say to themselves: "We can not afford to starve; we can not afford to burn our ships or turn them to a different trade; we can not afford to give up the avocations of our lives and go into some new pursuit; we are fishing lawfully upon the high seas, and if we happen to enter within 3 miles of a Canadian coast it seems we are likely to be overhauled and our flag hauled down, our officers and men insulted, our property taken and confiscated, and no damages returned to us. We do not intend to stand it; we will fight." And the first man that is killed, yes, the first blood that is dropped in a controversy of that kind upon the Canadian coast will be the tocsin of war, and the people of the United States would be plunged into it just as rapidly as they were by John Brown's raid at Harper's Ferry, perhaps more; and they would go into it unanimously on this occasion, for you will find just as much support on the Gulf of Mexico as you will on the coast of Maine for American fishermen in defense of their rights.

It can hardly be claimed by the Senator from Alabama, after his attention is called to those statements, that he spoke under restraint. It can hardly be pretended by anybody that he was not speaking what at that time he believed to be the true condition. Nobody will do him the injustice to say that he stood here before the Senate imposing upon us and imposing upon the country that which he did not believe. When he said we needed no new treaty he believed it. When he said our treaty rights were too plain for controversy he believed it, and he had said only what the Secretary of State had said, and what all of the illustrious predecessors of the Secretary of State had said who had passed upon this question, without a single exception.

I was one who listened to the speech of the honorable Senator on both occasions to which I have referred. I took it that as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations he had given care and thought to the subject, and that our treaty rights were exactly as he put them before the Senate. It is my duty to look into these matters, and yet I trusted and believed in him, because I had not given the subject as much attention as he had, and I relied upon his extraordinary zeal in the direction he had been charged as a member of the committee.

If his brother Senators yielded assent to his views then, what ought to be said of the poor New England fisherman who was told that his rights were unquestioned to go into those harbors and buy bait and ice? The Senator did not mean to lead them into a trap. He believed then, just as he said, that the treaty of 1818 needed nothing but a firm enforcement of its provisions. That was all we needed to do, for he declared that while Canada had made these claims Great Britain had never made them.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that no ship or vessel of any kind was ever seized for buying bait and ice until within the last three years. I challenge the Senator or his associates to produce a single case where the seizure was for that cause prior to 1885.

Yesterday, when the Senator from Alabama was addressing the Senate, he took occasion to speak of the conduct of the Committee on Foreign Relations in reporting to the Senate this treaty. He asserts that the Senate committee declared that the time for negotiations had passed. The committee declared that there was nothing to negotiate on so far as that treaty was concerned.

They took exactly the same position that the Senator from Alabama himself had taken as a Senator on this floor before the whole world. They took exactly the same position that he as a member of that committee had taken in 1887. But the Senator from Alabama said yesterday:

It is in reference to the commercial privileges of our fishermen, and alone in reference to these alleged rights, that the startling doctrine is asserted and the rash attitude is taken in the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations that the fisheries are no longer a proper subject of negotiation and that the time for negotiation with Great Britain has passed.

Yet that is exactly what the Senator asserted here on this floor more than once in the two speeches to which I have called the attention of the Senate.

So I do not think it lies in the mouth of the Senator from Alabama to arraign us on this side and to charge that we have been guilty of attacking this treaty for the purpose of getting votes for the Republican party, when we take the very same position that he took, the very same position that the Secretary of State took, the very same position that Mr. Phelps, our minister to Great Britain, took on this question.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], who addressed the Senate a few days since, took exception when I said he had presented the Canadian side of the case more strongly than it was ever presented by any Canadian authority. In that speech he declared, as did the Senator from Alabama practically yesterday, that this had been a subject of controversy for seventy years. I have heard that statement repeated in every speech which has been made on the opposite side. There were twenty-five years after that treaty was made when the British Government never addressed a word to the American Government as to contentions concerning the treaty. That will be found in Mr. Rush's letter, which was put in the RECORD by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. That was the case for twenty-five years, as I read to the Senate the other day, which I do not need to read again.

When the Secretary of State says this is a new claim, made for the first time in 1843, notwithstanding the statement made by the Senator from Maryland that the British Government had all the time insisted upon this construction of the treaty and had enforced it, I stand here to-day and say they never enforced it an hour, unless it was within the life of the present Administration. They never said we could not buy bait; they never said we could not buy ice in any way that was authoritative. I am speaking now of the construction of the treaty of 1818 practically. While they said they adhered to the view the Canadian authorities had advanced, yet they did not think it was worth while to enforce it, and they declined over and over again to allow the Canadian authorities to administer upon the treaty according to their contention, as the Senate can see by a reference I have here. December 31, 1877, Governor Sir John H. Glover wrote from Canada to Earl Carnarvon as follows:

Governor Sir John H. Glover to Earl Carnarvon.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, 31*st December*, 1877.

MY LORD: I have the honor to inclose a minute of my executive council, giving their opinion as to the injurious results to the fisheries of Newfoundland from the barring for bait for exportation, as pointed out in the senior naval officer's report inclosed in your lordship's dispatch No. 68.

2. At the same time, my ministers, in anticipation of legislative action upon this important subject, deem it advisable to request me to have it brought under your lordship's consideration before the next session, which annually meets neor the end of January.

3. From the admission of the Americans to rights of fishery on this coast under the Washington treaty, more difficulty will be experienced than heretofore in the carrying out of the local acts regulating the taking of herring; but with additional steam aid it is hoped that more efficient protection will be afforded in those parts where breaches of the law will probably occur.

4. There is a strong feeling extant against the American fishermen, who this year with numerous vessels visited many of the fishing stations, before free from their intrusions, their chief object being to procure fresh bait and ice, which they did in large quantities, for their bankers, to the alleged injury of our inshore fishermen. This year there has been in several places a failure in the fishery, which to a large extent is attributed to this American interference.

5. The effect of the recent decision at Halifax, as reported, disallows this traffic under the treaty, and from the opinion prevailing my ministers surmise that more stringent legislation will be demanded effectually to check this traffic than at present exists, and that a large majority in the legislature on both sides will press for the adoption of such a policy.

6. Should such be insisted upon, it appeared probable to my ministers that it would embrace prohibition to colonial fishermen to supply or aid in supplying, or to export, fresh bait, which would in that respect apply equally to the French with the Americans, but the latter would have the advantage of taking for themselves if they pleased to do so; and it is conceived that the exercise of this right would not be so prejudicial as the practice that has lately existed in taking away the colonial fishermen from their own fishing to procure a supply of bait and ice for the Americans.

7. It may be safely asserted that with the experience derived from the operation of the Washington treaty there would be no probability of the legislature extending the concession to fish in our own waters.

I have, etc., etc.,

JOHN H. GLOVER.

To this the Government replied, among other things:

With this report before them, Her Majesty's Government can not but feel uncertain whether any failure in the bait fishery of Newfoundland would be remedied by the adoption of the measures proposed by the house of assembly, and whether the practice which is complained of, and which it is sought to prohibit, has been sufficiently proved to have diminished the actual quantity of bait visiting the coast; although the increased competition of the Americans may have made it less easy for the local fishermen to secure the bait they require for their own fishing.

9. But, apart from this view of the question, Her Majesty's Government deem the present moment inopportune to effect any such change in practice as that which it is desired should be established; they are giving their most careful consideration to the whole question of the fisheries, both as regards United States subjects and the subjects of France, and they feel that a satisfactory solution of the several important points at issue might be considerably hindered by action in the direction suggested by the assembly.

10. You will be so good as to communicate this dispatch to your Government.

I have, etc.,

M. HICKS-BEACH.

This was in accordance with the former instructions which had been given. In 1879 Mr. Babson and Mr. Foster were detailed by the State Department, as I understand, for the purpose of examining these questions as to our fishermen's rights, etc., and they reported to the then Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts. They quote the dispatch of Sir M. Hicks-Beach, and they say:

This dispatch of Sir M. Hicks-Beach follows the course pursued by one of his predecessors, the Duke of Newcastle, who, during the time the reciprocity treaty was in force, wrote to the governor of Newfoundland "that no act can be allowed which prohibits expressly, or is calculated by a circuitous method to prevent, the sail of bait." (Duke of Newcastle to Sir A. Bannerman, August 3, 1863.)

Mr. Phelps contended for the right of the American fishermen to buy ice and bait in a letter which he sent to Lord Rosebery, June 2, 1886, and which is found in Senate Executive Document No. 113, page 118, as follows:

The British Government has repeatedly refused to allow interference with American fishing vessels, unless for illegal fishing, and has given explicit orders to the contrary.

On the 26th of May, 1870, Mr. Thornton, the British minister at Washington, communicated officially to the Secretary of State of the United States copies of the orders addressed by the British Admiralty to Admiral Wellesley, commanding Her Majesty's naval forces on the North American station, and of a letter from the colonial department to the foreign office, in order that the Secretary might "see the nature of the instructions to be given to Her Majesty's and the Canadian officers employed in maintaining order at the fisheries in the neighborhood of the coasts of Canada." Among the documents thus transmitted is a letter from the foreign office to the secretary of the Admiralty, in which the following language is contained:

"The Canadian Government has recently determined, with the concurrence of Her Majesty's ministers, to increase the stringency of the existing practice of dispensing with the warnings hitherto given, and seizing at once any vessel detected in violation of the law.

"In view of this change and of the questions to which it may give rise, I am directed by Lord Granville to request that you will move their lordships to instruct the officers of Her Majesty's ships employed in the protection of the fisheries that they are not to seize any vessel unless it is evident and can be clearly proved that the offense of fishing has been committed and the vessel itself captured within 3 miles of land."

In the letter from the lords of the Admiralty to Vice-Admiral Wellesley of May 5, 1870, in accordance with the foregoing request, and transmitting the letter above quoted from, there occurs the following language:

"My lords desire me to remind you of the extreme importance of commanding officers of the ships selected to protect the fisheries exercising the utmost discretion in carrying out their instructions, paying special attention to Lord Granville's observation that no vessel should be seized unless it was evident and can be clearly proved that the offense of fishing has been committed and that the vessel is captured within 3 miles of land."

Lord Granville, in transmitting to Sir John Young the aforesaid instructions, makes use of the following language:

"Her Majesty's Government do not doubt that your ministers will agree with them as to the propriety of these instructions, and will give corresponding instructions to the vessels employed by them."

These instructions were again officially stated by the British minister at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States in a letter dated June 11, 1870.

Again, in February, 1871, Lord Kimberly, colonial secretary, wrote to the governor-general of Canada as follows:

"The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818, and by the terms of the imperial act 59 George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure, inconsistent with the general policy of the Empire, and they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling, and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

And in a subsequent letter from the same source to the governor-general the following language is used:

"I think it right, however, to add that the responsibility of determining what is the true construction of a treaty made by Her Majesty with any foreign power must remain with Her Majesty's Government, and that the degree to which this country would make itself a party to the strict enforcement of the treaty rights may depend not only on the literal construction of the treaty, but on the moderation and reasonableness with which these rights are asserted."

I am not aware that any modification of these instructions or any different rule from that therein contained has ever been adopted or sactioned by Her Majesty's Government.

Judicial authority upon this question is to the same effect. That the purchase of bait by American fishermen in the provincial ports has been a common practice is well known. But in no case, so far as I can ascertain, has a seizure of an American vessel ever been enforced on the ground of the purchase of bait or of any other supplies. On the hearing before the Halifax Fisheries Commission in 1877 this question was discussed, and no case could be produced of any such condemnation. Vessels shown to have been condemned were in all cases adjudged guilty, either of fishing, or preparing to fish, within the prohibited limit. And in the case of the White Fawn, tried in the admiralty court of New Brunswick before Judge Hazen in 1870, I understand it to have been distinctly held that the purchase of bait, unless proved to have been in preparation for illegal fishing, was not a violation of the treaty, nor of any existing law, and afforded no ground for proceedings against the vessel.

So much for the statement of the Senator from Maryland as to the denial of commercial rights, who insisted that we had no commercial rights as fishermen, and as I recollect his words he said substantially that it was a crime for us to so assert.

The Senator from Maryland also dealt with the subject of the 3-mile limit. He said that Great Britain will not surrender these points to which she has so steadily adhered and which she has so steadily insisted on and enforced. I wish to say to the Senator from Maryland that in all his reading he will not find a single case where the British Government have attempted to enforce the Canadian theory that we were prohibited from going into those bays. I say that every time the British Government have spoken upon this subject they have restricted it to within 3 miles, not of the bays, but within 3 miles of the coast or within 3 miles of the land. The British Government have been careful to say "land" on every occasion, and I challenge the Senator to find a single case where they instructed the Canadian authorities that they did not instruct them with the view of maintaining our contention of the treaty and not the Canadian contention.

How can it be, the Senator asks, that the great and strong and high-strung nation of Great Britain are called upon to yield that which they have practically enforced for so many years? They have never enforced it. The headland theory was as absolutely dead as it could be. If they had not abandoned it, they had at least abandoned all efforts to put it in force. Mr. Tupper declared in his speech to the Canadian Parliament that it had been abandoned; that there was a practical abandonment and renunciation of the right asserted under the headland theory. They had declined over and over again to allow the Canadian authorities to enforce it. And now we are told if we do not accept this treaty the English view will be taken and will be enforced. If it is taken at all, it will be because back of them are the American President and Secretary of State with the statement that we had no rights except those which they conceded to us as to the headlands and commercial privileges.

The Secretary of State knew exactly what the contention of the British Government was. He knew exactly the attitude of the British Government. He knew that there never was a time when they proposed to enforce the Canadian view. He could not have been ignorant of that, for this is what he said, among other things, in a letter to Mr. West, May 20, 1886:

I beg to recall to your attention the correspondence and action of those respectively charged with the administration and government of Great Britain and the United States in the year 1870, when the same international questions were under consideration and the status of law was not essentially different from what it is at present.

This correspondence discloses the intention of the Canadian authorities of that day to prevent encroachment upon their inshore fishing grounds, and their preparations in the way of a marine police force, very much as we now witness. The statutes of Great Britain and of her Canadian provinces, which are now supposed to be invoked as authority for the action against the schooner David J. Adams, were then reported as the basis of their proceedings.

In his note of May 26, 1870, Mr. (afterwards Sir Edward) Thornton, the British minister at this capital, conveyed to Mr. Fish, then Secretary of State, copies of the orders of the Royal Admiralty to Vice-Admiral Wellesley, in command of the naval forces "employed in maintaining order at the fisheries in the neighborhood of the coasts of Canada."

All of these orders directed the protection of Canadian fishermen and cordial co-operation and concert with the United States force sent on the same service with respect to American fishermen in those waters. Great caution in the arrest of American vessels charged with violation of the Canadian fishing laws was scrupulously enjoined upon the British authorities, and the extreme importance of the commanding officers of ships selected to protect the fisheries exercising the utmost discretion in paying especial attention to Lord Granville's observation, that no vessel should be seized unless it were evident, and could be clearly proved, that the offense of fishing had been committed, and the vessel captured within 3 miles of land.

This caution was still more explicitly announced when Mr. Thornton on the 11th of June, 1870, wrote to Mr. Fish:

"You are, however, quite right in not doubting that Admiral Wellesley, on the receipt of the later instructions addressed to him on the 5th ultimo, will have modified the directions to the officers under his command so that they may be in conformity with the views of the Admiralty. In confirmation of this I have since received a letter from Vice-Admiral Wellesley dated the 30th ultimo, informing me that he had received instructions to the effect that officers of Her Majesty's ships employed in the protection of the fisheries should not seize any vessel unless it were evident, and could be clearly proved that the offense of fishing had been committed and the vessel itself captured within 3 miles of land."

Nowhere can gentlemen find that the British Government ever attempted to sustain the Canadian authorities except on paper. All that was required of the American Government was to say: "We adhere to the construction put upon the treaty of 1818, unquestioned for twenty-five years; we adhere to the practical construction that you put upon it ever since the question was raised by the Canadian government." If that had been done, as the Senator from Alabama said in 1886, there would have been no need of a new treaty upon this subject. Our rights are not to be enlarged by Great Britain and they are not enlarged in the slightest degree in this treaty.

I call attention to the instructions given in 1871 in what is published in Executive Document No. 113 as Appendix B. This is the language:

APPENDIX B.

In such capacity your jurisdiction must be strictly confined within the limits of "3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" of Canada, with respect to any action you may take against American fishing vessels and United States citizens engaged in fishing. Where any of the bays, creeks, or harbors shall not exceed 6 geographical miles in width, you will consider that the line of demarkation extends from headland to headland, either at the entrance to such bay, creek, or harbor, or from and between given points on both sides thereof, at any place nearest the mouth where the shores are less than 6 miles apart; and may exclude foreign fishermen and fishing vessels therefrom, or seize if found within 3 marine miles of the coast.

That is in keeping with the entire declaration of the British Government upon this question.

Jurisdiction.—The limits within which you will, if necessary, exercise the power to exclude the United States fishermen, or to detain American fishing vessels or boats, are for the present to be exceptional. Difficulties have arisen in former times with respect to the question whether the exclusive limits should be measured on lines drawn parallel everywhere to the coast and describing its sinuosities, or on lines produced from headland to headland across the entrances of bays, creeks, or harbors. Her Majesty's Government are clearly of opinion that by the convention of 1818 the United States have renounced the right of fishing not only within 3 miles of the colonial shores, but within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek.

It is, however, the wish of Her Majesty's Government neither to concede, nor for the present to enforce any rights in this respect which are in their nature open to any serious question. Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen unless found within 3 miles of the shore, or within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or a creek which, though in parts more than 6 miles wide, is less than 6 geographical miles in width at its mouth. In the case of any other bay, as the Bay des Chaleurs, for example, you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, unless they are found within 3 miles of the shore.

"Action.—You will accost every United States vessel or boat actually within 3 marine miles of the shore along any other part of the coast except Labrador and around the Magdalen Islands, or within 3 marine miles of the entrance of any bay, harbor, or creek which is less than 6 geographical miles in width, or inside of a line drawn across any part of such bay, harbor, or creek at points nearest to the mouth thereof not wider apart than 6 geographical miles, and if either fishing, preparing to fish, or having obviously fished within the exclusive limits, you will, in accordance with the above-recited acts, seize at once any vessel detected in violating the law, and send or take her into port for condemnation; but you are not to do so unless it is evident, and can be clearly proved, that the offense of fishing has been committed, and that the vessel is captured within the prohibited limits." (Session Papers, volume IV, No. 4, 1871.)

DOWNING STREET, October 10, 1870.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a memorandum, which I have requested Lord Granville to transmit to Sir E. Thornton, with instructions to communicate with you before addressing himself to the Government of United States on the subject to which the memorandum relates.

The object of Her Majesty's Government is, as you will observe, to give effect to the wishes of your government, by appointing a joint commission, on which Great Britain, the United States, and Canada are to be represented, with the object of inquiring what ought to be the geographical limits of the exclusive fisheries of the British North American colonies. In accordance with the understood desire of your advisers it is proposed that the inquiry should be held in America.

The proposal contained in the last paragraph is made with a view to avoid diplomatic difficulties which might otherwise attend the negotiation.

I have, etc.,

KIMBERLY.

Governor-General the Right. Hon. Sir JOHN YOUNG, G. C. B., G. C. M. G.

The Secretary of State used the following language in July, 1887:

The treaty of 1818 related solely to fisheries. It was not a commercial convention, and no commercial privileges were renounced by it. It contains no reference to ports, of which it is believed the only ones then existing were Halifax, and possibly one or two more in the other provinces, and these ports were not until long afterwards opened by reciprocal commercial regulations to vessels of the United States engaged in trading. * * * The purchase of bait and other supplies by the American fishermen * * * is not regarded as inconsistent with any of the provisions of the treaty of 1818. * * * Neither the treaty of 1854 nor of 1871 gave commercial privileges; yet during the existence of these treaties no question was ever made of the right of American fishermen to purchase bait and other supplies in Canadian ports.

On the 13th of July, 1886, Secretary Bayard wrote to Hon. Charles Levi Woodbury, of Boston, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 13, 1886.

SIR: Your letter dated July 7, with twelve affidavits of Gloucester fishermen alleging their long-continued custom of purchasing bait in places and ports in Nova Scotia to be used in deep-sea fishing, has been received, and shall be placed on file for future reference in connection with claims for compensation growing out of the unlawful prevention of this usage by the Canadian authorities.

I am, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Not only did the American minister and the Secretary of State take that position, but the Senators in this body and the members of the House who discussed this question in 1887, took the same position. Yet to-day we find one at least of the Senators from Alabama, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] who has spoken on this subject, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], and the Senators from Delaware all insisting to the contrary. I can not say that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] intends to insist on a different view, for I could hardly determine what he meant to say upon that subject; but all the other Senators on that side who have spoken on this question insist that there was no right to buy bait. The President of the United States in his message to the Senate declared that there was no right to buy bait. The Secretary of State in an interview in the Boston Herald declared that there was no right to buy bait.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps that was unauthorized.

Mr. TELLER. A Senator says "Perhaps that was unauthorized." If so, I have not heard of its being denied by the Secretary of State, any more than I have heard the other interview of which I spoke the other day denied by the Secretary of State. This is what he is supposed to have said in the Boston Herald, and I have no doubt what he did say, because it has never been questioned, and it has been referred to on one or two occasions in the Senate:

But, say the critics, the treaty does not secure us the right to buy bait and other fishing supplies unless we admit fish, and fish, whale, and seal oil free of duty as a consideration. How else, I would ask, could we get that right? It was expressly excluded from the treaty of 1818.

He had declared that the right was not excluded by the treaty of 1818, but that it came to us by the commercial arrangement of 1830, which was the position of the senior Senator from Alabama, and which was the construction that our Government had put on it ever since that time.

What Canada does say is that if she becomes our partner in the fishing business, supplying us with bait and seines and other fishing supplies, she shall be allowed to share the market with us. But this is all over and beyond the real and substantial advantages secured to us by the treaty.

What have Canadians said about it? Mr. Tupper's speech before the Canadian Parliament has been read so often that I do not need to read it again—wherein he spoke of the advantages. Let us see what some of the others said about it. The Montreal Gazette said:

We secure every right for which we have contended in the correspondence of the last two years. The Americans are debarred from the "touch and trade" and transshipping privileges. We have obtained everything we ever claimed.

The St. John (New Brunswick) Sun said:

The advantages of our present position will be sufficiently evident when the next controversy arises, which will be when the first American fisherman is prevented from doing something he wants to do. Should he be prevented from purchasing bait, forwarding supplies, or shipping a crew on our coast, the usual outcry will be raised, charges of brutal treatment and of uncivilized conduct will be made, and the President will be invited to retaliate by proclaiming non-intercourse. It will then be open to Mr. Foster to remind the Secretary of State that he has himself admitted the right of Canadians to do these things, and has agreed to a formal treaty recognizing that right. Nor will it be longer open to Mr. Bayard to use the language which he has rather freely employed heretofore, and which more clamorous politicians and less responsible men of his nation have used more freely than he. The President may retaliate, but if he does he will be retaliating to a nation which is doing what the President and his Cabinet and the President's chosen commissioners have admitted to be within the right of that nation to do.

I do not wonder that Senators on the other side are somewhat sensitive on this subject. I do not wonder that they do not want to be brought to the test whether the President will enforce the law we put on the statute-book in 1887 with such unanimity, with only two dissenting votes, one in each body, when they will be met by the declaration of the President himself, in an official message to this body, in which he says substantially that we have got all we could expect, when the President says that the Canadian construction of this treaty is a proper construction.

I do not believe that there is any danger of the threat we have heard so often, that the President will enforce that law to the destruction of the great interests of the Northwest; but if he does, if he thinks it is necessary for the protection of the New England fishermen and the maintenance of the honor and dignity of the nation, the people of the great Northwest will not find any fault, provided it is done for that purpose and not for the purpose of assisting the Canadian Government and the British Government in compelling us to grant to them free fish, which it has been said over and over again by the Secretary of State and by our minister to Great Britain and by members of the Senate on both sides was the great purpose and object of the outrages upon our fishermen.

I can not omit before closing to call attention to what Mr. Tupper said on this particular question in connection with what I read a moment since. Mr. Tupper proposed to plead an estoppel on us. Much of what he said has been read. After having detailed what the American Government had done in the way of legislation and the danger to Canadian commerce, he said:

This was the condition of things when I went down last Easter to see Mr. Bayard at Washington. If you compare the condition of things to-day with the condition of things that existed then, there is no man, I care not how partisan he may be, how unfriendly to this Government he may be, who can judicially look at the position of this question then and now, without coming to the conclusion that we have emerged from midnight darkness into the light of day under the auspices of this treaty. It may be said, Suppose that the treaty is rejected by the United States Senate—a not impossible contingency—I need not tell the House that one of the advantages we enjoy under British institutions is that we are saved from the extreme and violent antagonisms of party that every fourth year the Presidential election brings about in the United States. Now, any man who knows anything of the politics of the United States, knows that however good a measure is, however valuable, however much it commends itself to the judgment of every intelligent statesman in that country, it is a matter almost of honor on the part of the party in opposition to prevent the Government of the day from doing anything that would give them any credit or strengthen their hands in the country; that on the eve of a Presidential election it is next to impossible to induce a Republican majority in the Senate to sanction anything that a Democratic administration has carried through, however valuable it may be.

Mr. President, that is a base slander upon the American people. We have not been in the habit of making these questions a test of party fealty. That is a portion of the "combine" between the present Democratic party and the Canadian party, and this Canadian member of the partnership is speaking exactly as the American portion of it has been speaking on this floor and as the Secretary of State has spoken on more than one occasion and as he has spoken by letter.

But, sir, take the very worst contingency—suppose this treaty is rejected by the Senate, what then? Will we be relegated back to the position we stood in a year ago? Not at all. If our efforts, by mutual conciliation, by concessions on both sides, to find a common ground, that we could present to all the parties to this treaty, as an honorable and equitable agreement that might be fairly accepted, if these efforts had failed, if, after three months' negotiations, we had broken up with embittered relations, because we found that it was impracticable to get any common ground of meeting on which the Governments of the two countries could agree, there is no question that matters would have stood in a worse position than that in which they stood when we undertook these negotiations. But, sir, that is not the position. Let the Senate of the United States to-morrow reject this treaty—I trust they will not do so; I have a hope that there is independent statesmanship enough in the great Republican party of the United States, who have the power at their disposal to-day in the United States Senate, to allow that sentiment of patriotism to overweigh the party advantages they might hope to obtain by preventing the present Administration from settling this vexed question; but when they remember that for seventy years—

There, I suppose, is where the Senators have got the data on which they insist that for seventy years this has been a bone of contention between the two Governments—these questions have been agitated which are now disposed of, they may see that if they should come into power themselves at any early date it would be an advantage to have this vexed question between the two great English-speaking nations of the world set at rest, that there may be no renewal of the difficulties which have existed so long a time. But let me take the very worst contingency, that of the rejection of this treaty, and how do we stand? Why, sir, let me read from a letter of the Secretary of State of the United States, written to the citizens of Boston, who invited him to go there to deliver a speech upon the treaty. In Mr. Bayard's letter, of 26th March, he says:

"I am convinced that the welfare and true interest of our country and a just and wise treatment of the British American population on our northern frontier alike counsel the adoption of the treaty. In its initiation, negotiation, and conclusion, I can truly say for my associates and myself no views but those of a single-minded, patriotic intent have been allowed place or expression, nor can a trace or suggestion of partisanship be justly alleged. The sole and difficult question to which the treaty relates, the fishery rights of one nation in the jurisdictional waters of another, began with the first dawn of our recognized independent existence as a nation, and ever since has conspicuously presented itself at intervals, exciting bitter controversy, and never been satisfactorily or permanently disposed of. Meanwhile the surrounding circumstances have importantly changed in advance with rapid and vast growth.

"The treaty of 1818 remains unaffected in its terms by seventy years of such material progress and development on this continent as we of to-day are the witnesses. Unless the treaty of 1818 shall be wholly abrogated and recurrence necessarily had to the dangerous status that John Quincy Adams so ably but unavailably discussed with the Earl of Bathurst, in 1815, and which had resisted all efforts of negotiation, and at Ghent in the year previous, it is manifest that a joint and equitable construction in consonance with their existing relations and mutual needs must be agreed upon between Great Britain and the United States, and this, I affirm, is done by the present treaty."

Again he says:

"Conciliation and mutual neighborly concessions have together done their honorable and honest work in this treaty—paved the way for the relations of amity and mutual advantage."

Now, sir, I ask you whether all the time, all the trouble expended in this matter is not amply compensated for by the declaration of the Secretary of State of the United States bearing his tribute and his testimony to this treaty as a fair, equitable, and just interpretation of the treaty of 1818. And what more, sir? Let me read from the message of the President of the United States:

"As a result of such negotiations a treaty has been agreed upon between Her Britannic Majesty and the United States, concluded and signed in this capital, under my direction and authority, on the 15th of this February instant, and which I now have the honor to submit to the Senate with the recommendation that it shall receive the consent of that body, as provided in the Constitution, in order that the ratifications thereof may be duly exchanged and the treaty carried into effect. The treaty meets my approval, because I believe that it supplies a satisfactory, practical, and final adjustment upon a basis honorable and just to both parties of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates. A review of the history of this question will show that all formal attempts to arrive at a common interpretation satisfactory to both parties of the first article of the treaty of October 20, 1818, have been unsuccessful, and with the lapse of time the difficulty and obscurity have only increased.

"Negotiations in 1854, and again in 1871, ended in both cases in temporary reciprocal arrangement of the tariffs of Canada and Newfoundland and of the United States, and of the payment of the money award by the United States, under which the real questions in difference remain unsettled, in abeyance, and ready to present themselves anew just as soon as the conventional arrangements were abrogated.

"The situation, therefore, remained unimproved by the results of the treaty of 1871, and a grave condition of affairs, presenting almost identically the same features and causes of complaint by the United States against Canadian action and British default in its correction, confronted us in May, 1886, and has continued until the present time.

"The four purposes for which our fishermen under the treaty of 1818 were allowed to enter the bays and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland within the belt of 3 marine miles are placed under a fair and liberal construction, and their enjoyment secured without such conditions and restrictions as in the past have embarrassed and obstructed them so seriously.

"The enforcement of penalties for fishing or preparing to fish within the inshore and exclusive waters of Canada and Newfoundland is to be accomplished under safeguards against oppressive or arbitrary action, thus protecting the defendant fishermen from punishment in advance of trial, delays, and inconvenience and unnecessary expense.

"The hospitality secured for our vessels in all cases of actual distress, with liberty to unload and sell and transship their cargoes, is full and liberal.

"The provisions will secure the substantial enjoyment of the treaty rights for our fishermen under the treaty of 1818, for the contention has been steadily made in the correspondence of the Department of State and by our minister at London and by the American negotiators of the present treaty.

"The treaty now submitted to you has been framed in a spirit of liberal equity and reciprocal benefits in the conviction that mutual advantage and convenience are the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between States, and that with the adoption of the agreement now placed before the Senate, a beneficial and satisfactory intercourse between the two countries will be established so as to secure perpetual peace and harmony.

"In connection with the treaty herewith submitted I deem it also my duty to transmit to the Senate a written offer or arrangement, in the nature of a modus vivendi, tendered after the conclusion of the treaty on the part of the British plenipotentiaries, to secure kindly and peaceful relations during the period that may be required for the consideration of the treaty by the respective governments and for the enactment of the necessary legislation to carry its provisions into effect if approved.

"This paper, freely and on their own motion, signed by the British conferees, not only extends advantages to our fishermen, pending the ratification of the treaty, but appears to have been dictated by a friendly and amicable spirit."

I ask you to contrast that language with the position we occupied a year ago in regard to the great republic to the south of us? Let the Senate reject the treaty to-morrow, and I ask what is the changed position of Canada? Yesterday we stood face to face with a non-intercourse bill, sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with few exceptions by the prejudiced, irritated, and exasperated people of 60,000,000 lying on our borders. What, I repeat, is our position to-day? If that treaty were rejected by the Senate to-morrow we have gained that vantage-ground, that we stand in the position of having it declared by the Secretary of State of the United States and by the President of the United States that Canada has been ready to make, and that Her Majesty's Government, on behalf of Canada, through her plenipotentiaries, have made an arrangement with the plenipotentiaries of the United States that is fair, just, and equitable, and that leaves that country no possible cause of complaint. What is the result? The result will be this: That let a fisherman complain to-morrow of our interpretation of the treaty, of the enforcement of our most extreme construction of the treaty, the answer to him is this: Nobody is to blame for the inconvenience you suffer except the Senate of the United States. Your President, the Executive of your country; the Democratic party from end to end of the United States, declared it was a fair settlement. They represent an undoubted majority, in my judgment, of the people of the United States to-day, and I believe they will represent it to-morrow. We stand in the position that instead of being alone with the whole United States, President, Government, and people all against us, all denouncing us as adopting a harsh and barbarous interpretation of an old, antiquated treaty for the purpose of forcing reciprocity upon them, we occupy the vantage-ground of having these men out of their own mouths declaring that nothing has been wanting on the part of the Government of Her Majesty, or on the part of the Dominion of Canada to place this question on a fair and equitable basis, such as might honorably be accepted by the United States. I hold we have accomplished that without injuring in the slightest degree the fisheries of Canada, without injuring Canadian interests to any extent whatever.

We have made concessions, as I have said, but we have made them with the avowed object of placing all our people, not only the fishermen, but the agriculturist, the lumberman, every man in this country in a better relation with the United States than he was before. What is the result? As I have said Mr. Bayard told us, the American plenipotentiaries told us that there was but one way of obtaining what we wished. You want greater freedom of commercial intercourse. You want relaxation in our tariff arrangements with respect to natural products in which you are so rich and abundant. There is but one way to obtain it. Let us by common concession be able to meet on common ground and remove this irritating cause of difficulty between the two countries out of the way, and you will find that the policy of this Government, the policy of the President, and of the House of Representatives, the policy of the great Democratic party of the United States, will at once take an onward march in the direction you propose, and accomplish steadily that which you would desire, is the only way by which it can ever be attained.

Those were not empty words, those were the sober utterances of distinguished statesmen, who pointed to the avowed policy of the Government of the United States as the best evidence of the sincerity of what they said. What has happened already? Already we have action by the financial exponent of the Administration of the United States, I mean Mr. MILLS, the gentleman who in the United States Congress represents the Government of the day, and stands in the position most analogous in the United States to the finance minister in the House, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who propounds the policy of the administration in the House.

How is he elected? The Democratic party, sustaining the Government, selects a man as Speaker of the House of Representatives who is in accord with the policy of the Administration for the time being, and Mr. CARLISLE, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, nominates the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and all the members of the committee, and therefore the chairman of that committee occupies the position of representing the Government in bringing forward such bills as will represent the views and sentiments of the Democratic party in the United States supporting the Administration. What have we seen? The ink is barely dry upon this treaty before he, as the representative of the Government and chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, brings forward a measure to do what? Why, to make free articles that Canada sends into the United States, and upon which last year $1,800,000 of duty was paid.

Some honorable MEMBERS. We paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask, sir, if that is nothing?

Some honorable MEMBERS. Who paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to insult both the great political parties of this country who have since 1854 and long before maintained that the interests of Canada—the interests of British North America—were intimately bound up in obtaining free intercourse with the United States for our natural products; I do not intend to insult the two great parties in this country by telling them that they were fools, that they did not know what they were doing. Down to the present hour we have adopted the policy on both sides of the house and we have pledged ourselves to the people to do everthing that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United States, and I say you must answer me the question as to whether that was an act of supreme folly or whether it was wise statesmanship on the part of both parties in this country to adopt that policy before you ask me such a question as "who pays the duty?"

I say that under this bill which has been introduced and which I believe will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate, where the Republican majority is only one in the whole House, to pass the bill; it requires a majority of one only, and I am very sanguine that this bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be, but I am inclined to think the amendments will be still more in the interests of Canada than as the bill stands to-day. If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On copper ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid, or there was paid—to make it meet the views of the honorable gentlemen opposite more correctly—$96,945. On salt, $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill. I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case, from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry to find there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables not specially enumerated" will not exclude potatoes.

In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free you do not expect any person who wants to carry a bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and, as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this bill, of making those natural products of Canada free, carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States of America. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 pounds of one kind and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $183,852. Now, as I say, on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills bill amounts to no less than $1,800,193. You will be glad to hear that I do not intend to detain the house any longer. In discharge of the duties—the very onerous and important duties—of one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries at that conference I have steadily kept in view what in my heart and judgment I believed were the best interests of Canada. In the measure which I have the honor to submit to this house I believe will be found embodied a bill which it is of the most vital importance to Canada to pass.

As it stands to-day the Government of the United States have only my signature to sustain the course that has been taken. I was not there as the representative of the Government of Canada, nor can my signature to the treaty necessarily imply the approval and support of even the Government of Canada. I occupied on that occasion the position of one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, charged not only with the responsibility of what I owed to Canada but also the responsibility of my duty to the Empire. I can only say, sir, that I felt I would best discharge my duty to the Empire by steadily keeping in view the interest of Canada. I believe, sir, that there is no way in which any public man in this country can promote the interests of the great empire of which we form a part better or as well as by taking such a course of public action as will build up a great British community on this northern portion of the continent of America.

I believe, sir, that we owe it to the Empire as well as to ourselves steadily to keep in view every measure that will conduce to the rapid progress of Canada, the development of our inexhaustible resources, and the building up of a great and powerful British dominion on this side of the Atlantic. I say, sir, that in the discharge of my duty I have steadily kept that conviction in view, and I believe the course which has been pursued will not only commend itself to the judgment and support of the great majority in this house, but that the great majority of the people in this country will feel that in the adoption of this treaty we are taking a step that is calculated to conduce to the progress and greatness and best interests of Canada.

That is Mr. Tupper. That is the other part of this combination which has been made. I have an extract from a Canadian paper that reads well; it must be cheering to the American people. The Montreal Gazette, speaking of Mr. Cleveland, summarizes his services in this way:

Canadian people have a special and deep interest in the Presidential contest in the United States. * * * The fishery treaty might possibly be ratified by the Senate if Mr. Cleveland's administration is approved by the people.

It will not be. I can assure the Canadian portion of this partnership that no matter whether he is elected or whether he is defeated, this treaty will not be ratified by the American Senate.

* * * There can be no doubt that the chances of its ultimate acceptance will be greatly increased if Mr. Cleveland's administration is indorsed.

There is, however, an even more important reason why Canadians should wish for the success of Mr. Cleveland. The great issue of the day among our neighbors is tariff reform. * * * Mr. Cleveland's success meaning the passage of the Mills bill, and the passage of the Mills bill meaning a free market in the United States for our lumber, wool, iron ore, salt, and some other products. Canadians will watch with deep interest the progress of the campaign and the final outcome.

There is not any question but what there is great interest in Canada as there is in Great Britain over the coming election, not wholly in the interest of the treaty, but in the interest of the opening of our ports to British goods as near to free trade as is possible under the condition of things that now exists.

I want to allude to the position taken by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON], whom I charged with having stated the Canadian position stronger than the Canadians themselves. I have alluded to the fact that the Senator stated that the British Government had enforced these supposed rights for many years, and that he would utterly fail in the reading, which, he said, had convinced him that this was a proper treaty to be signed, against his first impressions, to find any attempt on the part of the British Government to enforce it. But he says that there has been an American construction of the same kind. He says that the great men of our country connected with this question have always said the same thing, and he quotes Daniel Webster. He quotes a portion of what Daniel Webster said, and then adds:

Other and leading American statesmen have again and again conceded that the controversy as to the true construction of this treaty was a most difficult and delicate contention. And what is even more significant, the practical conduct of our Government during this long period has virtually admitted that our rights under this treaty are so ill-defined, uncertain, and liable to dispute that it has been safer and more honest to trust to diplomacy for relief than boldly and confidently to proclaim ourselves to be clearly in the right and then to adopt the policy of retaliation or to appeal to the arbitrament of arms.

I deny the conclusions the Senator draws. There has been no time that this Government has not insisted and maintained a practical enforcement of its construction of the treaty of 1818. There has been no time, unless it is since this new treaty was signed, that even this Administration has not insisted on the practical working of the treaty of 1818 exactly as its predecessors had done.

The Senator reads to us what Daniel Webster said, for the purpose of sustaining the Canadian side of the case, but he did not read it all. He read "that the unfortunate construction of words," etc., but he did not read the context, he did not read the conclusion, he did not read the statement which he could not have overlooked, that Daniel Webster said that this was not a proper construction of the treaty. He did not allude to the fact that when it came before the American Senate, every Senator who spoke upon the subject, without reference to his party feeling or party affiliation, declared that the American construction was the true and proper construction of the treaty.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to what Mr. Webster did say upon this subject. It would have been well for the Senator from Maryland to have continued his researches far enough to have searched this part of the proclamation:

Not agreeing that the construction thus put upon the treaty is conformable to the intentions of the contracting parties, this information is, however, made public to the end that those concerned in the American fisheries may perceive how the case at present stands, and be upon their guard. The whole subject will engage the immediate attention of the Government.

This proclamation was written while the Secretary of State, it is supposed, was at his home. The Senator from Maryland grows facetious when he says that a greater man than Ignatius Donnelly had arrived who raises the question whether this was really written and signed by Mr. Webster himself. If the Senator had extended his inquiry a little further, or if he had been more careful to read the American documents instead of the Canadian documents, he would have found that in the Senate that question was bruited at the time. I have not any doubt but this must be treated as an official document of the Secretary of State. I have no doubt that it was written by other hands than his, but it has his name attached to it, and it has the seal of the Government attached to it. Therefore, so far as it affected the then intercourse with Great Britain, it would be treated as an official document of state. If the Senator had extended his investigations into reading the speeches made by the members of the Democratic Senate in 1852, he would have found this statement, not made by a Democrat, it is true, but a defender then of the Secretary of State, who said:

I am surprised that any doubts should be raised as to the proclamation being the act of the Government. I do not understand how a Senator or a citizen can officially know that the Secretary of State is at Marshfield or elsewhere, when the seal and date of the Department affirm that he is at the capital. I would like to know where or when this Government or this Administration has disavowed this proclamation.

So, then, it does seem that it was a question bruited then, whether the Secretary of State was responsible or whether some subordinate was responsible for the utterances in that proclamation. It might have been well for the Senator from Maryland to have read what the Secretary of State said when addressing his neighbors at Marshfield. On the 25th day of July, 1852, he said:

It would not become me to say much on that subject until I speak officially and under direction of the head of the Government; and then I shall speak. In the mean time, be assured that that interest will not be neglected by this Administration under any circumstances. The fishermen shall be protected in all their rights of property, and in all their rights of occupation. To use a Marblehead phrase, they shall be protected "hook and line, and bob and sinker." And why should they not? They are a vast number who are employed in that branch of naval enterprise. Many of the people in our own town are engaged in that vocation. There are among you some who, perhaps, have been on the Grand Bank for forty successive years. There they have hung onto the ropes in storm and wreck. The most important consequences are involved in this matter. Our fisheries have been the very nurseries of our Navy. If our flagships have met and conquered the enemy on the sea, the fisheries are at the bottom of it. The fisheries were the seeds from which these glorious triumphs were born and sprung.

Then he goes on at some length. There was no indication that the Secretary of State proposed to surrender a single thing. The contention was just what it always had been, and it was the contention of Mr. Marcy, who presided over our foreign affairs as Secretary of State. He declared in a letter to Mr. Rush what our contentions had been, and the same contentions that we then had we are now making and always have made; and Mr. Rush, who was the minister to Great Britain for seven years after the treaty of 1818, declared that he had never heard these contentions of ours questioned, and he declared them to be the true meaning of the treaty. Who do you suppose knows better, the Senator from Maryland or Mr. Rush, who took part in the treaty? Who knows better what it means, Mr. Rush and Mr. Gallatin and the men who were concerned in it, or the Senator from Mississippi or the Senator from Alabama or the Senators from any other section of the country? That was the opinion of all the contemporaries of that time, and we are adhering to the same opinion and the same construction that was given from that time and has been given at all times in the State Department until our case was given away by this Democratic Administration.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama complains of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am not a member of the committee, but he says our side of the committee have humiliated themselves before Great Britain and the world; that they have put up an humble petition, an humble prayer, to Great Britain. Why, Mr. President, I have read the report with care, and I do not find anything of the kind in that report. I find an expression of opinion by the committee, but I find nothing else. I do not find the words that the Senator from Alabama put in when he said that "the committee can but hope that your Majesty's Government will take measures." I find no such words in the report of the committee. I find that the committee said this, and this is all they did say on the subject:

The committee can not but hope that if these ill-advised negotiations, which, as is known to all the world, can not properly commit the United States in any degree until they shall have received the constitutional assent of the Senate, shall fail to meet the approval of this body, Her Majesty's Government will take measures to secure justice and fair treatment in her North American dominions to American vessels and American citizens, in all respects and under all circumstances, and that that Government will see the justice and propriety of according to American vessels engaged in the business of fishing all the commercial rights and facilities in her North American ports that are so freely and cheerfully accorded to her own in the ports of the United States, and that thus the friendship and good feeling which ought to exist between neighboring nations may be finally established and secured.

To whom was the committee addressing itself?

To the American Senate and through them to the American people, and not to the British Government at all. It is no prayer, it is no petition; it is a hope expressed by them; a hope which I think, in view of the past history of that country, the committee were not justified in indulging. I think he who has read the history of Great Britain in its intercourse with other nations will bear me out when I say that in the annals of history there has been no nation that has been so regardless of the rights of others as the English nation. Great as it may be, and full of great deeds and great purposes, it has been always a nation ready to take that which it could get and keep that which it got without regard to the right of the transaction, and we have not any reason and our committee have not any reason to hope that that nation will deal fairly with us, unless we compel them by a determination expressed on our part to see that they obey the provisions of the existing treaty and the laws enacted by mutual agreement on both sides for the purpose of establishing general intercourse between these two countries.

England never did keep an engagement with any people in the world who were not ready and willing to compel obedience to what she had agreed. Her conduct in diplomacy and everything else is against the suggestion made by the committee. There is no reason to hope that Great Britain will concede to our American fishermen that which is the plain intent of the treaty of 1818, and that which she declared for twenty-five years by her silence was ours by right of treaty, that which by her failure to enforce for many years she had practically abandoned, unless she feels the power of the Government of the United States.

I do not know that I quite agree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], who said yesterday that this never would be a free nation until we should whip England a third time. I know one thing, we shall never be a free nation unless we assert that which belongs to us, unless we are ready and willing to stand up for that which is ours clearly, and which, in the provision of the treaty of 1783, is ours whether it be boundary or independence.

Great Britain made a treaty with us in 1783, by which she was to return to us the possession of the Northwest. She only returned that to us when we were ready by war to compel her to return it. During the Revolutionary war she incited the savages of the country to the murder and rapine of our defenseless frontier settlers, and when the war of 1812 came, brought about by her disregard of international rights, by her proceeding in defiance of her treaty stipulations with us, who has forgotten the wicked Dartmoor prison where she put our men and smothered them to death?

Who has forgotten that in all her wars she has been the most aggressive, the most blood-thirsty, the most destructive of the human race, until it has become a proverb, growing out of her conduct, that the Anglo-Saxon is the cruelest of all men? Who would expect Great Britain to yield anything except by demand and by the knowledge that we have the power to enforce the demand? Who has forgotten, who does not remember, that before the war she attempted to incite division between the North and the South, that she built up abolition societies everywhere, as we supposed in the North, because of her hatred of slavery, and yet when the South attempted to establish a government based upon human servitude Great Britain as a nation sympathized with her?

Great Britain through all that struggle attempted to find some pretext for open hostilities with us. Under the pretense that she wanted to collect a debt in Mexico she put on our southern border an army, with France and Spain, for the purpose of giving aid and encouragement to the Confederacy, for the purpose of establishing human slavery in perpetuam, and she justified the declaration of Jefferson, who declared that she would destroy the liberties of the world that she might sell a bale of furs. You can not expect much from a nation that to-day and at this hour is legislating for the purpose of putting citizens of that country upon trial in a court that is unknown to the law, in a court that, even by its constitution, will be an outrage upon the fundamental principles of free government, a nation that is sending her brightest and her best men to jail for simply appearing at a public meeting to protest against the wrongs that their fellow-men are suffering at the hands of the consolidated power of that great nation.

Oh, you can not expect much from her, and the committee might be criticised for saying that anything of that kind should be hoped for. When you see it stated openly and practically undenied that the policy is to take the brightest and best of the Irish and put them in prison and keep them there until they shall die in order that the people may be subdued, you can not expect much from that Government unless you bring to it the strong hand of a great people like ours. Two of their great men have gone to their graves, the victims of British brutality and British hate, simply because they dared to stand in a public meeting and proclaim their opposition to the most odious and barbarous laws of the age. England for three hundred years has oppressed the people of a neighboring isle with all sorts of cruelties and wickedness that would shame the very savages of the wilderness. By her political methods and her economic methods she has oppressed Ireland, once a prosperous and happy land with more than 8,000,000 people, and has reduced them in this year of our Lord 1888 to less than 5,000,000.

By her course of procedure at one time, and within a short time, she put a million and a quarter of Irish people in the grave, starved to death, or dying with sickness from starvation, dying in a land that had food for twice the number of its inhabitants. Ireland fruitful, rich, able to support to-day twice its population, stands there with its people starving! Why? Because of the economic administration of Great Britain in Ireland for the benefit of the people of Great Britain! Three million of the Irish people have left their homes in three decades.

Mr. Parnell stated some time ago, when in this country, that one-third of the people of the United States were Irish or of Irish descent. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know that there is enough of that Irish blood in this country which runs through the veins of some of our best and noblest men, to see to it that this country shall not be a mere dependency of Great Britain, but that we shall assert our rights when we know what they are, with as much tenacity as any citizen of that proud country ever did.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think that the committee were justified in saying that they hoped Her Majesty's Government would yield what was rightfully ours. We shall get it, I repeat, only when we say to them, "These rights are ours, and we propose to have them, peacefully if we can, forcibly if we must." I do not think myself that there is any authority that will deter the American people from asserting their rights. I do not think the fear of war, I do not think the fear, as the Senator from Alabama suggested yesterday, that England could destroy five hundred millions of property on our coast and our lakes, is going to deter us from standing here and everywhere demanding that which is ours, that which our fathers bought with their blood, that which we have in every administration from the beginning of the Government down to this hour asserted to be ours, without exception, even including this present Democratic Administration. And no man need say to me that that which the earliest of our fathers claimed as a right, that which every man who followed claimed as a right, I am claiming now as a right simply because I am a Republican. I am claiming it because I am an American, and I know that back of me and back of every man who takes that position will be the great mass of the people, independent of party affiliation; and I say to the Democrats on that side of the Chamber you can not carry your own political party when it comes to degrading the great name of the American people.

Mr. President, yesterday when the Senator from Alabama concluded his address to the Senate he turned to the Democratic side of the Senate and said, "Fellow Democrats, let us be true to the Government," and when he said that he looked into the faces of three-fourths of those on the Democratic side of the Senate who had been in arms against the Government of the United States, who had forfeited every right they had to citizenship and to liberty and to life, and yet the Government of the United States never spilled a drop of blood after the war was over and gave them the privilege of coming here and sitting here to make laws and to pass upon treaties!

But does the Senator believe that the American people will be edified when he turns to his late Confederate associates and says, "The men on the other side of the Chamber are not patriots; they do not act in the interest of the Government; they act for party purposes and party purposes alone, and although we have belied our record, although we have gone back on that which we asserted, although we are compelled to go back on the assertions of the Secretary of State and the minister to Great Britain, yet we are the patriots and we alone are to be trusted?" Ah, Mr. President, he will not fool anybody. We heard that before the war, and we have been hearing it ever since. The great American heart lies in the North. It was the great American heart that was touched when Sumter was fired on; it was the great American heart that stood all the hardships and the expense of the war and brought these people back in close connection with the Government, rightfully there now, and we will welcome them to all that we claim for ourselves, but we will not here or anywhere else permit it to be said that they have more virtue, more patriotism, more love for American manhood and American integrity and American glory than we.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]——

Mr. REAGAN. If it is in order I ask unanimous consent for the passage of a little bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order in open executive session. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next?

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] desire to be recognized on the pending question?

Mr. VANCE. I desire to announce that I shall be pleased to have the privilege of the floor on this question on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from North Carolina when the consideration of the treaty is resumed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn——

Mr. MORGAN. Does that take precedence of a motion to go into legislative session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moves that the Senate do now adjourn until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. VANCE. Has not an order already been made that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn until Monday next?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been so ordered.

Mr. VANCE. I suppose the proper motion, then, would be to reconsider the vote by which that order was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for a division.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. What is the question—to adjourn until Monday or until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate do now adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ALDRICH.

Mr. BUTLER. If I am not wholly misinformed, I think an order upon that subject has already been made.

Mr. HOAR. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps while the Senator from South Carolina was absent, the Senate agreed, on motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next at 11 o'clock. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] now moves that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to correct the Chair in one respect. I was present when the order was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BUTLER. And I took great pleasure in voting for that proposition to adjourn until Monday. I do not like to be put on record as voting against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Pending the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That the roll-call has commenced and the name of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has been called, and, according to a previous ruling of the Chair, that roll-call can not be interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call does not properly commence until there has been a response. There had been no response.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon; I thought a roll-call was a roll-call without a response.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], but I transfer the pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], who is absent, and vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his vote.

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the affirmative). As this grave question of adjourning appears to have reached to the magnitude of a party question, although I believe my pair would vote "yea" if present, I expect I had better withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws his vote.

Mr. FRYE (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. FRYE. Then I withdraw my vote. I am paired with him.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from

New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay" with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. MANDERSON. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] are paired.

Mr. BATE. My colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. GEORGE. My colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the fact that a pair has been announced between him and the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SPOONER. He was here when I left the Chamber awhile ago and I thought he was still present. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the roll will be called.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is lost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is lost, but the absence of a quorum being disclosed, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALTHALL] is necessarily absent.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Colquitt,	Hoar,	Riddleberger,
Bate,	Cullom,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Brown,	Evarts,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Call,	Frye,	Pasco,	Stockbridge,
Chace,	Gibson,	Payne,	Teller,
Chandler,	Hampton,	Platt,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Ransom,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Hiscock,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calling of the roll discloses the presence of forty-four Senators.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose my motion is next in order, to adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I object to anything but the regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. That is not in order. I have made a motion to adjourn to 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire only to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator from Missouri proceeding?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that the Senate do now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that no business has intervened between the motion to adjourn and the same motion now again submitted by the Senator from Missouri, and therefore it would not be in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is legislative business in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order. The question therefore recurs——

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to adjourn is not in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order now, because the Senate has just passed upon it and there has been no intervening business.

Mr. COCKRELL. There was no quorum at that time, and there has been a roll-call since, which has disclosed that there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the motion to adjourn was lost. There were 16 in favor of the motion and 18 against it. It is in the power of less than a quorum either to adjourn or refuse to adjourn. The motion to adjourn was lost; no business has since that time transpired, except the calling of the roll to ascertain whether a quorum was present, and the Chair does not think that is intervening business. Therefore, the Senate having just passed upon a motion to adjourn, the Chair thinks it can not be made again until business shall have intervened, and the only business pending now before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, which takes precedence of the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. MITCHELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If the Senator from Kentucky were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PALMER. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

At this point the Clerk of the House of Representatives appeared below the bar of the Senate, bearing a message from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senate receiving a message from the House of Representatives before the result of the vote is announced?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If there is a quorum and it is not contrary to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is contrary to order; but is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object. Let us stand by the order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object.

The result was announced, as follows:

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Let us hear what the Chair decides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces that the calling of the roll discloses the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HOAR. I respectfully submit to the Chair that it does not require a quorum. This vote is that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, and holds that the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] is in order. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did the Chair declare the vote taken just now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventeen to 7. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the roll discloses the presence of forty-two Senators, more than a quorum. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston;

A bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.; and

A bill (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6619) for the relief of Eliza A. Cutler Jones was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 8127) for the relief of Lucy M. Swinnea and Mary E. Hanserd was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 210) authorizing the printing of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, August 3, 1888.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives. Has the House appointed conferees, may I ask?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not; at least no conferees are announced in the message on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When a motion has been made to adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock and another motion has been made simply to adjourn, and the Chair has ascertained that no quorum voted on either of those propositions, and then there was a call of the Senate which disclosed that there was a quorum present, may I ask whether there is any motion in order or any other business in order except to take the vote on the motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules provide that messages from the House of Representatives may be received at any stage of business, except when the Journal is being read or when the Senate is dividing.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is it in order when there is a motion to adjourn pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that——

Mr. PLATT. Are we not in open executive session now; and, if so, can we transact legislative business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and the President pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise with some delicacy to make a suggestion. The matters in conference between the two Houses relate to the amendments providing for heavy ordnance, coast defenses, etc.——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Senator from Connecticut will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. The rule, I understand, is positive—the usage of the Senate certainly, and, I believe, the rule—that two of the conferees shall be Senators friendly to the action of the Senate.

As I have said, it is a matter of delicacy with me to make the suggestion; but the usual committee of conference appointed in such cases consists of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has the subject-matter in charge. The Senators from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], two members of the subcommittee, are on record, by their speeches, as being very strongly opposed to the amendment in question. I call the matter to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. Are there any other matters technically or formally involved?

Mr. HAWLEY. There are some other matters technically involved.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to make one observation with reference to what the Senator from Connecticut has said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. I was myself at one time, in regard to an amendment on one of the appropriation bills, in very much the same condition as the Senator from Connecticut now is. There was an amendment to an appropriation bill that I advocated with great earnestness and which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] resisted with all his zeal and ability—and everybody knows that that Senator's zeal and ability are very great, for he is thoroughly in earnest—and the Senate agreed by a very small majority to the amendment which I had moved.

The Senator from Kansas was put upon the conference committee. I then made to the Chair the same suggestion which the Senator from Connecticut has now made to the Senate. The President of the Senate at the time was the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. Davis, and the conclusion was come to that, as there were several other matters in issue, he could not pick out one rather than another, and say that that alone must be considered in making up the conference committee on the part of the Senate, and he pursued the usual rule to appoint members of the Committee on Appropriations. The result was that the Senator from Kansas held on to my amendment, going before the House conferees with the same tenacity with which he had fought it in the Senate. If I had been on the conference committee myself I should have lost it. As it was, it was saved.

Mr. ALLISON. May I say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that, in theory, the managers of a conference on the part of the Senate are appointed by the Chair. In fact, they are designated by the friends of the measure; and, upon appropriation bills, have been uniformly the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the particular bill. The Chair is ready to be instructed, or to take the sense of the Senate on the question.

Mr. ALLISON. May I say one word in reply to the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Senator from Iowa may proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair has stated the usual custom respecting appropriation bills. I think I can say in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that it has been the uniform custom of the Appropriations Committee, without reference to their action in the Chamber, to stand by the views of the Senate relating to all items in appropriation bills. The theory, as I understand it, of these conference committees is that the members of the committee on the part of the Senate shall represent the Senate, and not the views of the persons comprising the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my suggestion, Mr. President. I made no motion—only a suggestion, and I withdraw even that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The managers of the conference will stand as previously announced.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to make one observation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding.

Mr. HOAR. While I am of opinion that at the time of adjournment, without regard to the question of a quorum, it is in the power of the Senators present to adjourn to a day certain, or to an hour certain, notwithstanding the existence of a previous order of the Senate, fixing another time to which the Senate shall adjourn—and I think that a consideration of what would be the condition of the Senate on the first day, before they had passed their usual standing order to meet at 12 o'clock, will demonstrate that—yet I am informed that after the vote to-day several Senators on both sides of the Chamber went to Atlantic City, relying on the vote of the Senate to adjourn until Monday. Under those circumstances I think, myself, that it would be questionable, and subject to debate, whether it would be just to those Senators to insist on a motion which would practically reverse the earlier action of the Senate. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand it is not proper to make a motion to adjourn after having made remarks. I desire to state to the Senate just this——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senator from Virginia may proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. A motion to adjourn is not debatable—certainly not before any more than after. I desire simply to say that it is apparent to the Senate that what is to be called a tariff bill is to be brought in here in conflict with the fisheries treaty; and the tactics of the opposition to both is to adjourn at every time they can, and to meet at the latest hour they can.

I mean to raise this further point to-morrow morning, that that business which has come into this Senate after the disclosure of a failure of a quorum on a roll-call is not law, and can not be made law, because there was no motion in order after the disclosure of the want of a quorum except to revert to the original motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of legislative business; and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) adjourned to Monday, August 6, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 3, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAUL BUTLER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation to pay a judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of Paul Butler for royalty on hook attachments, used at the national armory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BACON, until Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. DARGAN, for ten days.

To Mr. WEST, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PUBLIC BUILDING, OMAHA.

The SPEAKER. Some days ago the House refused to agree to the report of a committee of conference on the bill providing for the erection of a public building at Omaha. Since then the motion to reconsider that vote has been made, and is still pending. It is necessary, therefore, to withdraw that report from the Senate; and if there be no objection an order will be made directing the Clerk to request its return.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1560) to extend the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of court therein;

A bill (H. R. 8783) to authorize the Kentucky Rock Gas Company to lay conduit pipes across the Ohio River;

A bill (H. R. 9056) to protect purchasers of lands lying in the vicinity of Denver, Colo., heretofore withdrawn by the executive department of the Government as lying within the limits of certain railroad grants, afterward held to lie without such limits;

A bill (H. R. 9077) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side track into square No. 1025, in the city of Washington; and

A bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER. The Senate, in accordance with the request of the House of Representatives, has returned to the House the concurrent resolution the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of 39,000 copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, that should have been a joint instead of a concurrent resolution; and I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the House heretofore taken, with a view to amending the resolution to make it a joint instead of a concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made; and the question is on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 210) was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HISTORY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced by request a bill (H. R. 11086) providing for the purchase of the manuscript and copyright of the History of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA A. CUTLER JONES.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] has withdrawn objection to the bill presented, and I desire to have it considered this morning.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6619) for the relief of Eliza A. Cutler Jones.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid Mrs. Eliza A. Cutler Jones, of Scottsville, Monroe County, New York, the sum of $5,000, in five annual installments of $1,000 each, out of any money that may hereafter be appropriated for the use and benefit of the Cheyenne Indians.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6619) for the relief of Eliza A. Cutler Jones, submit the following report:

Your committee find that Henry C. Jones, the son of the claimant in this case, with several others, while engaged in the survey of public lands in the State of Kansas, near Fort Dodge, in March, 1874, was ruthlessly murdered by a roving band of Cheyenne Indians; that Congress, recognizing the justness of claims of this kind, has paid to Mrs. O. F. Short and Mrs. James Shaw, whose husbands and sons constituted the other members of the party at the time of the massacre, $5,000 each as compensation for their loss.

Your committee think therefore that the claimant, who is now old and infirm, should receive a similar amount as compensation for the loss of her son, who was then a youth of twenty-one years, unmarried, and upom whom she depended for support, and accordingly recommend the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. This claim I have no doubt is a good claim as far as the merits are concerned, but it belongs to the class of claims for the settlement of which we have just provided, so far as the action of the House is concerned, a tribunal, in a bill passed for a commission on Indian depredation claims.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I beg my friend's pardon. That bill pertains to property destroyed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the gentleman who had charge of that bill whether it covered this character of claims?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This is precisely the same as other cases that have been paid off.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE], who had charge of the bill establishing this commission, whether this claim would come under the jurisdiction of that commission?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I do not think so.

Mr. BYNUM. I think it does.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. This is for a son who was murdered; and the other cases where there were parties killed at the same time have all been provided for by former action of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Why was this not provided for?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I do not know. This money is taken from the annual annuities of the Indians; it does not come out of the Treasury at all.

Mr. PEEL. What is the amount?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand this is an appropriation out of a trust fund—out of the annuities due these Indians under treaty.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. It has been done in the other cases.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But this is a trust fund out of which this appropriation is to be made. Now, I desire to know whether these Indians or any agent for them have been heard? We are acting in this matter, as I understand, without hearing the Indian side of the subject.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The same action has been taken in the cases of the others who were murdered in that party.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would like the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER] to explain to the House why this claim was left out when the other claims were settled.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That I am unable to explain.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask a question. It is stated that this is to be paid out of any money hereafter to be appropriated for the benefit of the Cheyenne Indians. We do not know that there will be any other moneys due them.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If there be not, then it will not have to be paid.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that we have any money that will be due them. I would like to have the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LUCY M. SWINNEA AND MARY E. HANSERD.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to have the Committee of the Whole discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8127) for the relief of Lucy M. Swinnea and Mary E. Hanserd, and that it be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Lucy M. Swinnea and Mary E. Hanserd each the sum of $640, the same being their respective shares of the value, as found by the Southern Claims Commission, of certain property taken for the use of the army of the United States known as the Army of East Tennessee.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I would like to have the report read.

The report (by Mr. STOCKDALE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8127) for the relief of Lucy M. Swinnea and Mary E. Hanserd, respectfully report:

John B. Bridgforth, of De Soto County, Mississippi, died in 1852, the owner of about 2,000 acres of land, situate in said county. He left surviving him four minor children—two sons, William D. and Thomas H. Bridgforth, and two daughters, Lucy M. and Mary E. Bridgforth.

About May, 1863, the Federal forces encamped in the neighborhood and took property belonging to these minors of the value, as hereinafter more particularly stated, of $2,560.

The two sons resided with their guardian, Thomas P. Bridgforth, the daughters with their guardian.

A claim was made on behalf of the sons before the Southern Claims Commission for their one-half of the property taken, but the guardian of the daughters made no claim for their interest.

The commission found that the property taken, consisting of 15 mules, 8 oxen, 14 cows, 2,000 pounds of bacon, 100 bushels of corn, 4 stacks of fodder, was of the value of $2,560, and the one-half of this was allowed and paid to the two sons; but no action having been taken on behalf of the two daughters, nothing was allowed and paid to them, all of which fully appears by reference to the records and files of the commission in the case now on file in the Treasury Department. These two daughters have since intermarried, Lucy M. with Mr. Swinnea and Mary E. with Mr. Hanserd.

It is doubtless due to the fact that no attention was given to the matter that the interests of these parties were not presented to the commission and they were not paid their shares respectively.

Your committee see no reason why they should not be paid the same sum that was paid to their brothers, namely, $1,280, or $640 to each. The claim is obviously a just one, and we therefore recommend the passage of the said bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I call for the regular order.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEW BERNE, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 4318) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of New Berne, N. C.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

STATUES OF RICHARD STOCKTON AND GENERAL PHILIP KEARNY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Trenton, July 25, 188-.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that in response to the invitation of Congress to each of the States "to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, of two distinguished persons who have been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown, or from distinguished civil or military services," to be placed in the old hall of the House of Representatives in the Capitol of the United States, the State of New Jersey has furnished a marble statue of Richard Stockton, member of the Continental Congress from New Jersey, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, eminent as a jurist, a patriot, and a statesman, and a bronze statue of Philip Kearny, captain and major of dragoons in the war with Mexico, and major-general in the United States volunteer army, who, distinguished in two countries for his conspicuous bravery and military accomplishments, lost his life in the service of his country at Chantilly, Va., September 1, 1862.

These statues, now in the National Statuary Hall at the Capitol, are herewith presented to the Congress of the United States by the State of New Jersey as her contribution to the collection of statues of illustrious Americans.

Very respectfully,

ROBT. S. GREEN,
Governor of New Jersey.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk, setting apart August 21, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, for the consideration of a concurrent resolution in connection with the matter of the communication just read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday the 21st day of August, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, be designated and set apart for the consideration of the following concurrent resolution:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor, and through him to the people, of New Jersey for the statues of Robert Stockton and Philip Kearny, whose names are so honorably identified with the history of the State and of the United States.

Resolved, That these works of art are accepted in the name of the United States and are assigned places in the old hall of the House of Representatives, already set aside by act of Congress for the statues of eminent citizens, and that a copy of these resolutions, signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be transmitted to the governor of New Jersey.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey that he name an earlier day.

Mr. PHELPS. As this resolution is a concurrent resolution, it seemed both necessary and courteous in fixing the date to consult with the Senators from the State of New Jersey, and it seemed more in harmony with their views and their convenience to select the day named in the resolution, their purpose being to have the same day fixed in the Senate, so that the concurrent resolution may be disposed of at the same time in both Houses.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I withdraw the demand for the regular order for the purpose of having considered the pending bill only, as I understand that this side of the House is behind as to bills of this character, and that this one will about equalize the matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to state that he withdraws the demand merely for the purpose of having one bill from that side of the House passed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is exactly my statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] that the last bill of this character which passed here came from his side of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have been six weeks trying to get recognition to pass a little bill, but the whole time of the House has been dealt with in this way.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if there are any bills on that side of the House that are not in the nature of public-building bills, I will yield——

Several MEMBERS on the Republican side. Regular order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One or two gentlemen over there have taken up the entire time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded and there is nothing before the House. The regular order is the call of committees for reports on bills of a private nature.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to antagonize the consideration of the Private Calendar with the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that in two ways. He may induce the House to refuse to agree to the motion of the gentleman from Texas, or he can move to dispense with the consideration of private business. Then the consideration of the unfinished business in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would have precedence.

Mr. BURNES. Then I move to dispense with the consideration of private business for to-day.

The motion of Mr. BURNES was agreed to—ayes 74, noes 57.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES], now that the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar has been dispensed with, to allow me to make a motion that Wednesday, August 15, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BURNES. I have no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I shall object to that unless two days are set apart for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. My special reason is——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10896) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

After line 9, page 66, insert:

"SEC. 4. That for the payment of the following claims certified to be due by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874, and under appropriations heretofore treated as permanent, being for the service of the fiscal year of 1885, and prior years, and which have been certified to Congress under section 2, act of July 7, 1884, as fully set forth in House Executive Document 393, Fiftieth Congress, first session, there is appropriated as follows:

"War Department claims allowed by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller: Pay of two and three years volunteers of 1871 and prior years, $32,039.30; bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs in 1871 and prior years, $30,660.65; bounty act of July 28, 1866, prior to July 1, 1880, $5,749.40; pay, etc., of the Army for 1886 and prior years, $2,539.95; pay, etc., of the Army for 1887, $19.32; traveling expenses of California and Nevada volunteers prior to July 1, 1885, $136.54; contingencies of the Army 1885, and prior years, $1,376.15.

"War Department claims allowed by the Third Auditor and Second Comptroller: Refunding to States expenses incurred in raising volunteers, $3,405.87; horses and other property lost in the military service prior to July 1, 1885, $14,149.27; commutation of rations to prisoners of war and to soldiers on furlough prior to July 1, 1885, $2,348.50."

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The Committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on their amendment to the bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said bill.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendment, non-concurred in by the House, to the bill (H. R. 7708) to increase the pension of Annie Gibson Yates; agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SAWYER, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. FAULKNER.

The message also announced that the Secretary of the Senate had been directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon, at Omaha, Nebr.

The message further announced that the Senate had appointed Mr. MANDERSON in place of Mr. DAVIS as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton with the rank and grade of colonel.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1324) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Wyoming, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. LAIRD. I have the consent of the gentleman from Missouri to recur to page 61 for the purpose of offering an amendment prior to going into discussion of the French spoliation claims.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 9, page 61, insert:

"For the payment of claims for arrears of pay and bounty to Union soldiers, or their legal representatives, already certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department and to be certified up to and including June 30, 1889, $1,300,000, as follows:

"Pay, etc., of the Army, $15,000; pay of two and three years volunteers, $530,000; bounty to volunteers and their widows and legal heirs, $630,000; bounty under act of July 28, 1866, $125,000; total, $1,300,000."

Mr. BURNES. I have consented that my friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] may present that amendment, but it is subject to a point of order. That point of order I make, which is that it changes existing law.

Mr. REED. There is no objection to offering the amendment.

Mr. BURNES. It may be as well to exclude it now.

Mr. REED. I understand the question is simply upon the point of order.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to make one suggestion to the gentleman in charge of this bill. Of course it is manifest to him and to every member of the House who has attended to the reading of the amendment, and who is conversant with the history of these claims, that this is simply in anticipation of the allowances that will be made by the accounting officers in the course of business. This amendment makes it possible for these claimants to receive their pay in the order of the allowances, instead of having to wait for a year or more for the action of the committee and the Congress. I do not concede that it is subject to the point of order, but even though it be so, it is not taking any advantage of the Government, while it is doing a thing which in conscience ought to be done for these claimants.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] have the kindness to state what existing law he regards this as in conflict with?

Mr. BURNES. In objecting to the consideration of this amendment, I do it because the proposition is not in order, inasmuch as it changes existing law; and in answer to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], I refer him to the act, called the "covering-in act," of March 3, 1874.

Mr. REED. The gentleman surely does not consider that this amendment is in conflict with that law, because that act simply provides for covering in unexpended balances which used to be employed, but which are no longer employed.

Mr. BURNES. The law requires the accounting officers of the Treasury to certify these claims to Congress for consideration. That is the existing law; so understood, so stated in the statute. This is to appropriate $1,300,000 in advance of the certification, and therefore I object to the further consideration of the proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me very plain that this is not in opposition to any existing law, because all these accounts are certified under laws which already exist, and this is only a question of making an appropriation to pay them. Congress can just as well, the House can just as well, make the appropriation in advance of the decisions which are to be made by the accounting officers in accordance with law as make it afterwards. Such was the custom some time ago with regard to these claims, and it is a custom which certainly ought to be kept up, for it has been a very great disadvantage to the people who are the creditors of the United States that they have been kept out of their money, some of them for years, simply to give Congress an opportunity, through its Appropriations Committee, to revise the decisions of the constituted officers of the Government; which decisions every one knows are as hard against the creditors of the United States as anybody on earth could be found to make, except a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

It is just as proper for Congress to make an appropriation in advance of the actual decision of the auditors and comptrollers as it is for Congress to make an appropriation for the completion of a public building, the construction of which has already been authorized by law, in advance of the receipt of the contractor's bid. I certainly hope that the Chair will so decide this question, that men who have been adjudged in accordance with law to be creditors of the Government may receive their pay.

I remember a poor man in my district, a soldier, who had been kept out of a small sum, less than $100, which belonged to him, and who was obliged to wait over a year in order to obtain an amount which, to my knowledge, he sadly needed. I am very sure that that case has a great many parallels, and I think the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] is in accordance with sound sense, with decent humanity, and is in no way in conflict with the best interests of the United States Government. For my part I would rather that once in awhile a claim should pass the auditors which could not pass the Committee on Appropriations than that all men, but especially men of this class, who are creditors of the United States, should have their claims postponed month after month and year after year. It takes long enough to get a claim through, Heaven knows. The officers of the Government, all of them, in the executive department, when they receive a claim of this kind, seem to sit down and endeavor to find how they can escape payment of it, and when we add to that difficulty a new revision of these claims by the Committee on Appropriations, I do think that we are saddling these creditors of the Government with a grievance which is too heavy to be borne. Therefore, unless the strict letter of the law will justify the Chairman in ruling this amendment out, I hope the House will have an opportunity to vote upon it, because I am sure that its justice and righteousness will commend it to every man who hears me.

Mr. LAIRD rose.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I think I have been sufficiently indulgent toward the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD]. If this were a new question I might be entirely willing to yield further and to have time occupied in the continued discussion of this matter. But, sir, it is no new question. This proposition is in contravention of the settled policy of Congress ever since 1874. It is in contravention of the practice which has prevailed here, and of the decisions of this House upon this very question.

Now, I will only say as a matter of history and as a warning to members of the House, that it has been but a year or two since a chief of division in the Department under consideration manufactured applications in horse cases, manufactured the testimony, and got away with some $12,000 of the money of the Government.

Mr. REED Did the Committee on Appropriations revise that matter or examine into it?

Mr. BURNES. I say that the fraud has been ascertained, the facts have been ascertained.

Mr. REED. Did the committee pass on those cases?

Mr. BURNES. I am not prepared to say——

Mr. REED. If they did, and if those claims escaped that safeguard, it would appear that we must have another.

Mr. BURNES. Perhaps the committee did not carefully scan the action of these accounting officers of the Treasury——

Mr. REED. Then it is evident that their scanning is of no good.

Mr. BURNES. Very well; because the Committee on Appropriations may make a mistake with regard to the examination of some of the ten thousand claims which come before them, that is no reason why we should undertake to change existing law upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. There is no existing law in this case.

Mr. BURNES. But the fact that what I have stated has been done is a sufficient warning to us to follow the law which provides that Congress shall receive these reports of the accounting officers of the Treasury and give them consideration.

Mr. REED. That is, follow a law that did not prevent this loss.

Mr. BURNES. Follow a law that did not prevent this loss.

Mr. REED. Precisely. Then what is the object of following it?

Mr. BURNES. We had better follow it and be more prudent, more scrutinizing in the future.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Because an accident or an oversight happened in one instance it does not follow that the course of procedure in general is not a sound one.

Mr. REED. But it is perfectly evident that this catch-all of the Appropriations Committee does not do any good.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The rule which the gentleman from Missouri insists upon would tend very much to multiply the chances against such a loss.

Mr. BURNES. Let me say in answer to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] and to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that although the Appropriations Committee did not discover this fraud, it was discovered in time to prevent the loss of the money.

Mr. REED. Discovered by whom?

Mr. BURNES. By Government officials.

Mr. REED. Then why not leave these matters to them?

Mr. BURNES. It does not make any difference by whom it was discovered. But if there had been a permanent appropriation that man would have drawn that money and carried it with him to Canada or elsewhere.

Mr. REED. To a poor fellow who has been kept out of his money for a year it is a very unsatisfactory answer to be told that the Government can not prevent thieving.

Mr. BURNES. But if there had been a general appropriation, as the gentleman desires, the man to whom I have referred could have drawn the money and carried it off.

Now, surely it is doing no injustice to insist that we should understand what we are paying before we pay it. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my objection to the consideration of this proposition.

Mr. REED. But there is no objection pending now. The question is now on the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I have stated emphatically all the way through that I would not consume the time of this House in discussing the point of order any further.

Mr. REED. But the Chair announced that there was no objection to entertaining the amendment; and we have been discussing the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I beg your pardon. The Chair surely did not so announce. While I was willing to hear the gentleman, I thought it just as well to settle the question at once on an objection to the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. REED. Then you have not much confidence in your point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated, in answer to a question of the gentleman from Maine, that the Chair heard no objection, and that the amendment was received subject to a point of order.

Mr. REED. Yes; the Chair repeated that statement.

Mr. CANNON. In addition to that, the gentleman from Missouri, as well as the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Nebraska, discussed the point of order; and there are two or three others of us who want to be heard upon it.

Mr. LAIRD. I wish to say one word on this point.

Mr. BURNES. I wish to make this suggestion. I may have been unfortunate in expressing myself, but it was my intention to object to the consideration of this amendment regardless of the point of order. I also made the point of order and reserved it so as to enable the gentleman to present his views.

Mr. REED. It is too late to make the objection now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that he would not object to the consideration of the amendment, but that it was subject to a point of order and that he made the point of order against it.

Mr. REED. That is what he said.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood; and the Chair submitted the question whether there was objection. No objection being heard, the gentleman from Maine thereupon made the inquiry whether this amendment was before the Committee of the Whole. The Chair stated that it was before the committee, subject to the point of order.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] will now be heard on the question of order.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, the immense advantage to a large number of people which will arise from the passage of this provision of course cuts no figure in the discussion of the technical questions raised as to the construction of the rules of the House, and their application to the pending proposition. But manifestly that is obvious to every member of this committee, and as much so probably to the gentleman in charge of the bill as to any other.

The rule invoked here, upon which the Chairman of this committee is asked to decide this amendment out of order, it occurs to me, and I submit accordingly, is entirely negative. If the Chair will permit me I will call his attention to the fact that up to 1870 the rule was that the appropriations were made in anticipation of the allowance by the auditing officers of the Government. Then the rule was changed, so that the appropriations followed instead of preceding it—not, as I understand the statute, for the purpose of referring the audited claims to the revision of the Committee on Appropriations, but because the vast weight and volume of the claims arising from the various incidental matters growing out of the war had so diminished that it was supposed not to amount to a public calamity to refuse payment until after the allowance of the claims, and thereupon the appropriation by Congress to meet such allowance.

Now, then, instead of there being a statute, to the existence of which this amounts to a violation, it is simply an absence of law; and the gentleman pleads the significance of the repeal of the statute which formerly and promptly provided for the anticipation of these claims the same as though it were a statute. I submit that there is no law or statute to which the amendment suggested by myself amounts to a violation; while on the other hand it is true that all appropriations are made now in anticipation of the action of the accounting or law officers of the Government, as this appropriation is sought to be made, not in defiance of existing law, but in consonance with the right execution of it, which is to be presumed by the accounting officers of the Government.

Every consideration of public policy, of public decency, and of public conscience requires the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. A word upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and to do that I want to call the attention of the Chair specially to the proposed amendment. It appropriates $1,300,000 for the following purposes: Pay, etc., of the Army, $15,000; pay of two and three year volunteers, $530,000; bounties to volunteers, etc., $620,000, and bounty under the act of July 25, 1866, $125,000.

Now, the Chair must take notice of existing law, and when the Chair does so it understands that these claims against the Government are all claims of record. That is to say, the services are shown upon the Army rolls; and then after that service is ascertained, these claims pass through the Second Auditor's Office as to certain items, and certain other auditors as to certain other items, and then through the hands of the First and Second Comptrollers, and all through the regular accounting officers of the Treasury, each passing upon the claims that are of record and existing under the former law. The facts go hand in hand with the law—the facts appearing of record.

My recollection and understanding are that formerly it was held that the appropriations for the payment of these claims or demands against the Government were permanent, and that the covering-in act, to which the gentleman has referred, by implication or otherwise, repealed the permanent appropriations. Now, if that be true, if it is merely an appropriation—the permanent appropriations—and the permanent appropriations having been repealed, and there being no money appropriated to pay the existing claims, existing of record, they have, under the practice of the Department, to be certified to Congress for the consideration of Congress, and when so certified Congress has been in the habit in the deficiency bill, as it does in this, of making appropriations therefor. That, as I understand it, is the fact. The permanent appropriations, therefore, having been repealed in 1874 for the payment of these claims, what is there in the law, or under the rules of the House, in providing for the service of the fiscal year 1889—twelve months from the 30th day of June last—prohibiting the appropriations of money to pay these claims as they may be ascertained by the accounting officers of the Treasury?

I know of no law, I know of no rule, I know of no practice of this House that would prohibit it. Certainly there is nothing in the way of public policy, certainly there is nothing in the way of precedent that prohibits it. If the gentleman complains that this may breed fraud and therefore the point of order should be sustained, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that all appropriations for the Army and for the public service that we make in this and other bills for the coming fiscal year are utilized and the money paid without its passing under the scrutiny of Congress. It only passes these same accounting officers.

Take the pay of the Army; take the thousands, yes, tens of thousands of objects for which we appropriate money for the coming fiscal year, Congress has no further control over the money after it is appropriated for the coming fiscal year. The service is performed, the matter passes over to the auditor and comptroller and the money is paid. Now, where is the risk? Observe how this appropriation is guarded. "Pay of the Army $15,000; two and three year volunteers and bounty under the act of July 28, 1866." If the act appropriates for services to be performed for the coming year, why can not we appropriate for these services which have been performed and are of record? There is not half as much chance for fraud in this case as there is in the cases where we appropriate for the coming fiscal year. Why, I find nothing in the law that prohibits this appropriation anywhere, and I find everything in sound public policy and from the standpoint of humanity that would authorize this appropriation to be made in payment of the small amounts to multitudes of soldiers who have waited for a quarter of a century for a pittance which was due them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me a moment? As I understand the law does authorize this——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. To determine the liability, and there is no law authorizing an appropriation after this determination has been obtained.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is for none except those authorized by law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Where there is a law determining the liability of the Government and recognizing the obligation to pay when judgment is arrived at.

Mr. BURNES. I will answer my colleague. In the first place I call attention to the fact that this is a general deficiency bill making appropriation for the payment of obligations incurred in the past. The proposition submitted would make an appropriation extending into the future. In the second place——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURNES. I would rather that you address the committee again and let me alone.

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, I will do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNES. In this bill every claim of the soldier for commutation, back pay, bounty, and loss of horses up to the 15th day of July is incorporated. Following usual precedents, when the bill shall have reached the Senate, that body will call for a still later report which will be within a week of the passage of the bill, and before the bill becomes law the claims certified to will have been appropriated for. That has been the usual practice. Now, the law which I have sent to the Chair is explicit to me. The law requires the accounting officers to ascertain and certify these claims to Congress, not for payment, but to certify them to Congress for consideration, and it must have force and effect upon the gentleman who occupies the chair of this committee. If they are to be sent under the law to Congress for consideration, what a mockery of justice, what a mockery in language it is to say that we will appropriate in advance and pay before consideration!

Now, sir, it is useless to dwell on a proposition so plain; but I call your attention emphatically to it, that every presiding officer must give force and effect to every statute; and this statute requires these accounting officers of the Treasury to send these claims to Congress, not for appropriation, not for payment, but it requires them to send those claims for consideration. It means necessarily consideration before payment. Now, having called your attention to that proposition, I desire to call your attention to a further fact. This question has been before this House before. It was brought up here in the last session of Congress; indeed, I believe it was brought up when the deficiency bill was under consideration this present year. The point was made when the same question was before the Committee of the Whole House at this session of Congress, and was then determined in favor of the law and in favor of the continued, constant, consistent action of the Committee on Appropriations. That which has become the settled policy of Congress, that which has received the sanction of both Houses of Congress for fourteen years, will not, I trust, be ruthlessly disturbed at this time upon this general appropriation bill. I have said, and I again repeat, that it has been the settled, consistent, and continued policy of Congress, never disturbed and rarely doubted, to take these claims and consider them, and after consideration to pay them; because it is absurd to say that we will pay and then consider.

Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that your long service in Congress and your knowledge of the facts which have been stated will enable you to reach a conclusion more accurate and reliable, perhaps, than anything I may be able to offer about the matter. It is absolutely certain that it has been the established action of Congress. But now as to the policy, as my friend from Illinois made some remarks about it, and I think I will close with that. By means of this law, and through this law, and directed by this law, which requires consideration before payment, this House has, during the period that I have been a member, saved to the Treasury a very large sum of money. I wish to call your attention to the fact that in the Forty-eighth Congress, under this very heading, under the head of horses, commutation, rations, etc., because they were transportation claims, there were allowed claims aggregating, I will say, in round numbers, $100,000.

If there had been an indefinite general appropriation, those claims would have been paid before consideration, and we would have considered them after the money was gone; but the Committee on Appropriations detected the wrong done, and subsequently——

Mr. REED. Did the Committee on Appropriations detect it?

Mr. BURNES. Yes, sir; it did.

Mr. REED. You had not ascertained that fact when you were last on your feet.

Mr. BURNES. I was speaking then of a different proposition.

Mr. REED. What is this case?

Mr. BURNES. I was speaking a while ago about the matter of the defalcation of the chief of a division.

Mr. REED. And what is this hundred thousand dollar matter that you are speaking of now?

Mr. BURNES. This hundred thousand dollars was for claims in behalf of certain insurance companies issuing policies upon steam-boats during the war at Louisville, Ky., and perhaps somewhere else.

Mr. REED. Which claims were discovered to be wrong by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BURNES. These insurance companies' claims were allowed at the Treasury and incorporated into the report.

Mr. REED. Are those the ones that were allowed by Mr. Maynard?

Mr. BURNES. I will answer you in a moment.

Mr. REED. Are they the same claims?

Mr. BURNES. They were disallowed by him upon a review, and the Committee on Appropriations placed itself in harmony with the accounting officers of the Treasury, so that that $100,000, which would otherwise have been paid out, were saved, with the approbation of the accounting officers of the Treasury as well as of this House.

Mr. REED. That is, the second opinion of the accounting officers was against the claims, whilst the first one was for them?

Mr. BURNES. I believe you are right, sir.

Mr. REED. Then how do we know which opinion was correct?

Mr. BURNES. The first opinion was in favor of the claims, and when the Committee on Appropriations raised the issue in considering the estimate or the reports of the accounting officers of the Treasury, then it was that, upon a review of the finding of those officers, at the instigation of the Senate of the United States, the accounting officers set aside or changed——

Mr. REED. Changed their own decision. Is that in a public document?

Mr. BURNES. I can not undertake now to tell my friend from Maine when those officers changed, because I think the same gentlemen did not make both decisions.

Mr. REED. Well, I want to get the information because I am curious about this matter. One set of men decided that the claims were right and another decided that they were wrong, and you adhere to the last decision.

Mr. BURNES. The first set of men decided in favor of the claims and incorporated them in their report. The wrong was discovered by the Committee on Appropriations and objection was made, and the matter was brought to the attention of the House, and the House sustained the committee, and the claims were stricken out. We refused to appropriate for them.

Then, the claimants having appealed to the Senate, the Senate demanded that there should be a review, and, we assenting in conference, a review was agreed to, and upon that review, which I presume was made by a different set of men and upon a very elaborate argument presenting the facts and the law, the action of the former accounting officers was declared improper.

Mr. REED. So that, after all, it may be that some citizen suffered rather than the Government?

Mr. BURNES. It may be; but I have not heard from those complaining citizens since, and I can say that the citizens interested were simply made citizens by law; they were corporations without a soul to be saved; they were insurance companies.

Mr. REED. Of course I understand that whatever a corporation does is wrong; that idea I am used to in the House here; but I have noticed that those decisions which meet the approval of the Committee on Appropriations are always decisions against the claimant. For instance, the Supreme Court of the United States was not able to convince the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. BURNES. My friend from Maine [Mr. REED] always wants to say something that is a little mean against the Committee on Appropriations. But the Committee on Appropriations can stand a good deal.

Mr. REED. I think so.

Mr. BURNES. It has stood a good deal.

Mr. REED. I think so.

Mr. BURNES. And foremost in the fight against the Committee on Appropriations has always been the able and the logical and the forceful gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. You are doing me too much honor.

Mr. BURNES. But I appeal not for the Committee on Appropriations. I appeal for honest government and for, as the Scriptures tell us, hearing a matter before we decide. A friend near me suggests that the gentleman from Maine does not know anything about the Scriptures and that therefore I am talking to him in an unknown tongue. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Well, even if I do not, I rather guess we are on a par in that respect.

Mr. CANNON. I merely want to call the attention of the Chair to two statements which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] makes. One is that this is a deficiency bill and can not carry an appropriation for the coming fiscal year. Let me read the title of the bill:

A bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

I call special attention to the last clause:

And for other purposes.

This bill all through carries appropriations for the coming fiscal year. The gentleman from Missouri himself, a short time ago, placed upon the bill by way of amendment an appropriation not for the last fiscal year. There are a number of such items reported by the Committee on Appropriations or offered by way of amendment, and they become admissible under these words in the title, "for other purposes."

The gentleman from Missouri also says that the law requires the officers of the Treasury Department to certify these claims. Let us see what there is in that point. Under the ordinary operation of law an appropriation lapses at the end of two years, that is to say, when an appropriation has been in operation two years any money which may not have been paid out for the service of the proper fiscal year is covered into the Treasury. If payment from an appropriation is made within two years, the payment is made without being certified to Congress, and such would be the case after the lapse of the two years were not the money covered into the Treasury. Whenever the money is covered into the Treasury the accounting officers certify the account or claim to Congress. The permanent appropriation in reference to claims of this kind was repealed in 1874; and as there is no money appropriated to pay these claims, they are, like other audited or allowed claims, certified to Congress. Now, I propose, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] and others propose, that money be provided to pay during this fiscal year such of these claims as may be audited.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct an impression which may have been left on the mind of the Chair by my friend from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] in alluding to what was done on this subject in the last Congress. The impression his remarks may have conveyed to the Chair was that this question had been raised in the last Congress and a ruling made adverse to the entertaining of this proposition. Now, I have a distinct recollection of that matter as it occurred at the time; I was myself the one who made the assault upon the custom which has obtained since 1874. I made no motion, as my friend from Nebraska has now done. There was no question raised, there was no ruling made by the Chair, but I opposed as vigorously as I was able the policy under which we were operating, because I believed it a very wicked one—the policy which excluded from prompt consideration by the Government claims for arrearages and bounties—this class of claims covered by the amendment of my friend from Nebraska. I wish, therefore, to state to the Chair my distinct recollection that there was no adverse ruling made in the last Congress. So much for one of the points made by my friend from Missouri.

Having discussed this policy in the last Congress, I have listened with interest to what has been said this morning, but without having my opinion changed. I think, however, the only question now before us is this cold question of order—whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska is in conflict with any existing law. I have listened attentively to hear my friend from Missouri quote any law with which this amendment conflicts, and I have heard none. He rests his case upon two propositions—first, custom, and secondly, the law which requires the accounting officers to send to Congress these allowances. Custom is not a law of this House. One line of legislation may have obtained last year, and another may obtain this year. We are tied down closely enough by the Constitution of the United States, without having the legislative discretion withheld from a wise consideration of what is best for the country. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to claim that custom can be quoted as against the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BURNES. I am glad my friend admits that my position is sustained by custom. Now, I wish to call his attention to the fact that the Speaker of the House at this session of Congress decided that, an express rule of the House having been violated constantly, the practice in violation of that rule having continued ever since he had been in the chair, therefore, although the terms of the rule were express, absolute, and unconditional, yet the custom having been in contravention of the rule, he would continue to follow the custom.

Mr. REED. That was a question of interpretation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We have no rule in this case; and when questions in regard to the construction of the rules arise, the Speaker may well refer to custom for the construction of a rule. But you must have the foundation of a rule on which to rest in order to make the argument of my friend from Missouri applicable to this case. Here we have no rule in conflict with the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. The accounting officers of the Treasury are required by law to send these matters here for our consideration, that we may appropriate money to pay them. The law creating these accounting officers and sending these matters to them for consideration provides who shall determine the legitimacy of these claims. That is the purpose of the lawmakers; and it is a well-settled rule of law that when the statute provides a mode of procedure for the consideration of certain questions, it also provides that the officers charged with that duty shall consider them.

Now, I submit to the Chair that there has been an utter failure here to point out any law with which it is in conflict. I do not intend to go into the policy of the question. I think it is an outrage that these bounty claims, so long standing, so old, so just, belonging to poor people throughout the country, should be made an exception and payment refused for one, two, three, four, and even five years, and claimants kept waiting all these years before a settlement can be obtained. I have received myself in almost every mail letters bearing upon this question, and asking that the Government should do justice to this worthy and needy class of people to whom they belong. I appeal to the Chair, therefore, for a ruling upon this question in the interest of humanity.

The class of cases covered by the amendments are only two, bounties and back pay. These are all that are covered by it in fact. It does not let in any railroad companies or "soulless corporations;" but these are claims of people having a soul and a body, although the latter is not always comfortably clothed, and so we may eliminate all the soulless rascals from our consideration. I hope we will have a favorable ruling.

Mr. BURNES. I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few moments longer.

It is always gratifying to me to hear the distinguished gentleman from Iowa gush, as he always does, when he talks of the "poor people" of this country. We are taking care of the poor people, and have been doing so for years and years just as fast as their claims are adjusted and the amounts ascertained.

He speaks of having "received letters," and also of the fact of these claims having been delayed in their consideration four or five years. We appropriate year by year up to date for these claims; but here is what we do not appropriate for, and this may account, not for the solicitude of gentlemen, but for the solicitude with regard to this matter in other respects. Sir, I hold in my hand certified claims ascertained by the Treasury Department and reported to the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and I find under this head, "Horses and other property lost in the military service"—a very ordinary caption, "Horses and other property"—the following allowances:

Globe Mutual Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo.	$4,000.00
The St. Louis Floating Dock Insurance Company	4,000.00
The Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	2,333.33
The Phœnix Insurance Company of New York	5,000.00
The Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati	3,000.00
City Insurance Company of Cincinnati	3,000.00
Eureka Insurance Company of Pittsburgh, Pa	5,000.00
Phœnix Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo	5,000.00
American Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	4,000.00
National Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	3,000.00
Central Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	3,000.00
United States Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo	5,000.00
American Central Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo	5,000.00
Eureka Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	4,574.19
Citizens' Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	1,744.52
American Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	1,744.52
Magnolia Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	2,287.10
City Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	2,287.10
American Central Insurance Company of St. Louis, Mo	3,787.09
Boatmen's Insurance and Trust Company of St. Louis, Mo	3,787.09
The Sun Mutual Insurance Company of New York	5,860.00
The Commercial Mutual Insurance Company of New York	2,441.67
The Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company of New York	5,860.00
The Washington Marine Insurance Company of New York	4,500.00
The American Insurance Company of Cincinnati, Ohio	4,667.00

These were the "horse claims" that under the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska would have been paid before consideration by Congress.

Mr. LAIRD. Oh, no; let me correct the gentleman; this item does not cover that account at all. It refers only to back pay and bounty.

Mr. BURNES. I trust the gentleman from Nebraska will be easy and keep himself quiet for a few moments. I say if the amendment of the gentleman had been in operation at the time the accounting officers of the Treasury allowed these claims, as "claims for lost horses, and property lost in the military service," amounting to about $95,000, it would have stood and would have been paid as for "horses lost." And so you see wisdom, law, and rule all require us to consider well before committing ourselves to such a proposition.

Mr. REED. Are you opposed to paying these claims to these people if they are due? Is there any statute that says a corporation shall not be paid in this country?

Mr. BURNES. No, sir.

Mr. REED. What is the objection, then, to paying them? From the language of the gentleman it would seem as if there was some sort of outrage committed every time a payment is made to a corporation, no matter on what ground it is based.

Mr. BURNES. Now my friend waited a long time to make a complaint about corporations, but I wish to call his attention to a fact connected with this report. That is the argument under the decisions of I. H. Maynard, the Comptroller, that these claims shall be disallowed, and disallowing them. If the gentleman means by that that I differ from the judgment of Mr. Maynard, he is mistaken; and if he means that I am opposing these claims because they are claims of corporations, he is mistaken. I oppose this method of legislation because corporations are generally the thieves that slip in to the accounting officers of the Treasury and get claims allowed for the loss of horses which have no relation to the loss of horses at all.

Mr, LAIRD. How do you know?

Mr. BURNES. My observation is the basis of my suggestion.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Just a word. I am not going to follow my friend from Missouri in his expressions of gush.

Mr. BURNES. None of these insurance companies are at Dubuque.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. As I said, I am not going to follow my friend in his expressions of gush. It has reached a point that if a man in discussing a question of policy alludes to the poor people of the country he is charged with "gush." If he talks about corporations, no matter how severely, he is misrepresented. I do not want to be driven from a cool consideration of this question by that line of talk. Now, all this talk about insurance companies does not apply here to this amendment. The amendment is specific. I hold it in my hand. It is to pay arrears of pay and bounty already certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department——

Mr. BURNES. What is the date of the document you allude to?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Certified and to be certified up to July, 1889.

Mr. BURNES. Those certified to are in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Not at all. This is for the next year. This amendment which we are now considering is for the benefit of these poor people of whom I have spoken. It extends to June 30, 1889, and is for $1,300,000. If it was in the bill the amendment would not be necessary now.

Mr. BURNES. Provision is made for all claims that have been allowed up to the 15th of July.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. So I understand; but this amendment is to settle those cases not covered by this bill. The desire is to settle these claims which the law provides for as they are allowed, just as the soldiers' pensions are paid when they are found due and payable.

Mr. REED. We should, of course, be inclined to admit a statement made about how much the Committee on Appropriations has done in the way of preserving the money of the Government but for the fact that I remember one case where it cost the Government over $100,000. It seems that its judgment in that relation could hardly be superior to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it delayed the passage of a bill which had the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States in a manner which cost the United States more than $100,000, so that I beg leave to offset that against this imaginary case where the committee is supposed to have saved the Government money.

Now, the proposition is this: During the whole of the next fiscal year there will be from time to time claims which will be certified to be correct and payable by the United States Government, and these certificates will be made by the authorized officials of this Government, who, we are bound to presume, will be as honest as the Committee on Appropriations and who have more thorough methods of investigation. Now, then, at the end of the next year this committee will make appropriations which will pay these bills. But every man who has had a bill certified during the month of July will have to wait at least until the next 4th of March to obtain a dollar of his money. That is not only the fact in regard to that individual, but it has been erected by this Committee on Appropriations into asystem.

I say that system is a gross wrong to the creditors of the Government; and this is so evident to the gentleman from Missouri that he makes no reply to that direct charge. But he says if you run the claims through the Committee on Appropriations there will be more delay, and therefore more chance of detecting any rascality. Now, I submit to this House that that is a very strange position. Do you believe the possibility of the detection of false claims against the Government by the Committee on Appropriations is worth the inconvenience to which you put every solitary creditor of the United States? If you say some Government officers will steal the Government ought to bear the loss, and not the creditors the inconvenience; and so far as my experience is concerned (and I have been here ten years), I would not give the one-quarter of a tenth of 1 per cent. for any protection that the Committee on Appropriations gives. I never have seen, and defy the gentleman to point out to me, one single instance where they have saved the Government against the dishonesty of Government officials. I venture to say that the saving will not be a quarter of a tenth of 1 per cent. I venture to say it will be nothing at all. It is simply that the committee is desirous of keeping power, is desirous of having all these matters stay in its hands. Why, when the Government appoints its own officers and those officers admit its indebtedness, and these gentlemen, except in a few instances, always pay these claims after the delay of a year, is it right or is it wrong to establish the system of paying the money when the Government officers declare it to be due? No man need be here in Washington to know that every Government official in the Departments, from the very nature of the case, sits down to consider claims against the Government, not for the purpose of approving them, but for the purpose of seeing if he can discover any way by which to prevent their payment. Why do I say that that is natural? Because the official gets no advantage from the payment of an honest claim that is disputed. On the contrary, he is liable to get opprobrium from the newspapers. The whole tendency is against the claimant.

Every Government official instinctively assumes an attitude of opposition to a claim. I had a little experience once with regard to the claim of a constituent of mine amounting to $150. The case was so absolutely plain that there could be no reasonable dispute about it. The like of it had been paid time and time again, but the first officer before whom it came had given it a bad "slam" and it took six months' work to get it through. I followed it up with pretty much the feeling that a man has with reference to a salmon that he is fishing for; he does not care so much about the salmon as he does about catching it. [Laughter.] But, as I have said, it took six months' work to get through that plain little claim, because somebody had messed it up when it first got before the Department. That case gave me an insight to the feeling that exists among Department officials with reference to claims against the Government, and I say that if we can not trust the interests of the Government with people who approach these claims with that kind of feeling, if we have got to add to the difficulties in the way of the claimant the scrutiny of the gentleman from Missouri and his colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, the operations of whose minds we have seen so often in this House, it is pretty hard for the creditors of the United States. [Laughter.]

This is not a new enactment. It is simply a proposition to provide for the payment of claims adjudicated according to law. And there is no more reason for saying that this is an attack upon existing law than there would be for insisting that it was an attack upon existing law for us to appropriate for a building the construction of which was already authorized by law, or for the maintenance of the Army and the Navy, until we had had the bills brought in before the Committee on Appropriations and audited by them. That is not the way to conduct a government; it is not a way in which the Army and the Navy could be carried on, and it is not a decent way in which to treat the creditors of the Government of the United States.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a distinction. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] does not challenge our legal right to consider this amendment, but he challenges the proposition on account of the abuses which he assumes are liable to arise if it is adopted. That is, he assumes that the officers of the Government will violate this law, and argues that therefore the law should not be passed. And, Mr. Chairman, the instance cited by the gentleman from Missouri is in no wise germane to this proposed amendment. It does not belong to the class of claims named in the amendment. By no possible construction of this amendment could anybody lug in the claim of an insurance company, or any such claim. This amendment is limited in its terms to the soldiers of the late war or their legal representatives, and is confined to certain classes of claims, two in number. The gentleman has been pleased to animadvert on some of the sentiments expressed by gentlemen in support of the legal proposition and of this proposed policy. If anybody were disposed to be so impolite toward the very polite gentleman from Missouri, he might describe the gentleman's efforts to condemn an amendment to pay these soldiers' claims upon the ground that the auditing officers might abuse the law by allowing claims of insurance companies and other corporations, as a piece of small pettifogging.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The amount due is to be determined simply by an inspection of the record.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has submitted an amendment to come in after line 9, page 61, of the bill. The head-line of this paragraph of the bill is, "War Department: Claims allowed by the Second Auditor and Second Comptroller," and this amendment is "for the payment of claims of arrears of pay and bounty to Union soldiers or their legal representatives, already certified by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department or to be certified, up to and including June 30, 1889, $1,300,000, as follows." Then follows a detailed statement of the amounts under each particular act of Congress under which the liability arises.

The Chair is of the opinion that whatever may be audited at this time or during this fiscal year is an expenditure previously authorized by law; and the Chair is also of opinion that it is immaterial whether the claims were allowed during the past fiscal year or in the present fiscal year, this not being a question of allowance or time of allowance, but a question of whether there is a legal obligation to pay, and whether the claims have been previously authorized by law. That point in the argument, the Chair is of opinion, is not well taken.

The point which seems to the Chair to govern this matter is contained in clause 2 of the act of July 7, 1884 (Statutes at Large, volume 23, page 256), as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at the commencement of each session of Congress report the amount due each claimant whose claim has been allowed in whole or in part to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who shall lay the same before their respective Houses for consideration.

The Chair understands this provision of law to apply to this class of cases. If it were simply a question as to whether these claims had been laid before the House at the beginning of the session, or had been transmitted to the Speaker, the Chair would be inclined to hold that that part of the provision was merely directory, and if they had gotten here in any other way they would be before the House for consideration. But this clause requires that the amount due to each claimant shall be certified to Congress for consideration. Now, if this amendment could be entertained, Congress, which had reserved to itself the right to scrutinize each particular claim, would be deprived of that right by making the appropriation in gross for the whole amount of the claims that may be allowed during the year. Therefore the Chair is of opinion that in this respect the amendment is in conflict with the provision of the existing law which gives to each member of Congress, Senator or Representative, the right to know and consider each claim and scrutinize the amount allowed to each individual. The general law allows this, but the amendment does not. The amendment being, in the opinion of the Chair, in conflict with the statute to which reference has been made, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the point of order had not been raised, the Chair would have been at liberty to entertain the amendment, would he not?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course.

Mr. BURNES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, after line 18, insert:
"For transportation of foreign mails from the United States to foreign countries, $16,000."

Mr. BURNES. In support and explanation of this amendment I send to the desk to be printed in the RECORD a communication on this subject from the Postmaster-General, addressed to the Speaker of the House.

The communication is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., July 31, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that there has been already expended for the transportation of mails from the United States to foreign countries, during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, the sum of $464,910.70, with several small amounts yet unsettled which will amount to about $1,000 additional.

There was appropriated for this service only $450,000. There is, therefore, a deficiency on this account of about $16,000, which it is urgently necessary should be provided for as soon as practicable.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

The SPEAKER, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 10 of the bill in order to offer three amendments relating to the District of Columbia, the first one by the authority of the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to return to page 10 of the bill for the purpose of offering certain amendments. The amendments will be first read, after which the Chair will ask whether there is objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after line 5, insert:
"To enable the commissioners to employ and pay special counsel in the case of Samuel Strong against the District of Columbia, to be submitted to arbitration under the joint resolution of Congress, approved July 10, 1888, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. SPINOLA. I raise a point of order upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to offer this amendment.

Mr. SPINOLA. I object, with all due respect to the gentleman.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] has been authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to offer this amendment. He offers it unless subject to a point of order.

Mr. McCOMAS. If it is subject to a point of order on account of being offered at this place, I will put it in another part of the bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. I shall object to the appropriation as being uncalled for and unnecessary—an attack upon the public Treasury without justification.

Mr. McCOMAS. It is to prevent robbery and plunder of the public Treasury.

Mr. SPINOLA. My object is to prevent the robbery of a private citizen by the authorities of the District; therefore I raise the point of order.

Mr. McCOMAS. I presume the gentleman does not object to the placing of the amendment at the right place. If he does I shall simply offer it to come in later. I want the amendment to come in its proper classification, as the gentleman in charge of the bill desires that these various propositions shall come under the appropriate head. My friend from New York does not object to the place where I propose to insert it?

Mr. SPINOLA. I do not care anything about the place; I am opposed to the principle.

Mr. BURNES. The gentleman from New York seeks to oppose the amendment and have it debated on its merits.

Mr. SPINOLA. Upon its merits, and upon the point of order to begin with.

Mr. McCOMAS. What is the point of order?

Mr. SPINOLA. That the amendment proposes to change existing law.

Mr. McCOMAS. How so?

Mr. SPINOLA. By existing law appropriation is made for the pay of the district attorney of the District of Columbia, who receives $4,000 a year for his services; his first deputy received $2,000 a year, and his second deputy $1,800. That is the law as it stands. This is a proposition to amend the law as already upon the statute-book; and I raise the point of order that it can not be entertained, as it amends existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] whether the special act passed at this session for the relief of Samuel Strong authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to employ special counsel for this purpose.

Mr. McCOMAS. My understanding is that it has no relation to it whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, in the opinion of the Chair, the point of order is well taken.

Mr. McCOMAS. One moment upon the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. I hope no decision will be made upon the point of order until the Chair has heard it discussed.

Mr. SPINOLA. I have no objection, of course, to hearing the gentleman.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, July 26, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I beg to say that the commissioners have this day requested the Committee on Appropriations to add to the deficiency bill a provision for the employment of special counsel at a compensation of $2,500.

The printed record in the case shows that Mr. Strong claims for items of work 134 in number, that the items aggregate in amount $424,216.35, and that the pleadings and testimony occupy 5,543 pages in print. The witnesses are about 100 in number, and the exhibits something over 700. The mere presentation of the case will consume not less than six weeks in time, and the last argument (under limitation by order of the court) occupied ten days. When it is considered that the case is to be heard by arbitrators, and that our office force will at the same time be occupied with the usual duties in court and in advising the commissioners on matters of ordinary administration, the impossibility of our giving the case the attention it requires is manifest. And inasmuch as the case will be heard and determined by the arbitrators during the current fiscal year, any provision for special counsel, in order to be of advantage to us, must be made at once.

It is, perhaps, needless to speak of the error that has been committed in submitting this matter to any but the established legal tribunals; but to make the best of a bad situation Congress should certainly provide us with adequate means of defense against a claim so large in amount and which I can not avoid characterizing as the most unfounded, brazen, and iniquitous in my experience as a public officer.

Yours, truly,

HENRY E. DAVIS, Assistant Attorney.

Hon. LOUIS E. MCCOMAS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. McCOMAS. This is a claim which has been pending for a quarter of a century upon a difference between this contractor and the government of the District of Columbia. It passed through the courts here under the charge of a very able lawyer, Mr. Francis Miller, who has since died. After ten days of argument the court cut down this claim very largely, reducing it several hundred thousand dollars. We had then a very remarkable proceeding in Congress. After the courts had decided that large sums of money were not due, after a legal investigation extending over years, the claimant had power enough to come before Congress and have the judgment of the court nullified and a special tribunal established by Congress to arbitrate his claim for $424,000, nearly one-half of which was cut down by the court. Now, when an effort is made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia to have this library of testimony, this mountain of documents, explored by some one other than the regular counsel of the District—the attorney who has had charge of the case having died, unfortunately for the cause of public justice—when the commissioners ask that in order to save the payment of all or a large part of this claim of half a million of dollars, $2,500, or so much thereof as may be needed, be appropriated that the District attorney may have the assistance of special counsel to resist the claim of this contractor who has been able to overcome the judgment of the courts, objection is made. That objection, I submit, is not for the public good.

Upon the point of order of the gentleman from Missouri it is only necessary to say that we frequently employ, and there are statutes enabling us to employ, special counsel in the Federal courts.

The CHAIRMAN. Employed by the Attorney-General.

Mr. McCOMAS. Employed by the Attorney-General.

Now, this is simply an expenditure in aid of existing law. I do not have it at hand just now, but it was passed at this session to enable this cause to be arbitrated between these parties with counsel, and is to enforce and give operation to the law which, overriding the judgment of the court, creates a special tribunal to hear it, and it follows by the very reason of the thing that the Government, in order to protect itself, must employ counsel.

Mr. RYAN. Is this a claim against the District of Columbia alone, or against the Government and the District of Columbia?

Mr. McCOMAS. My friend is right, I think, that this is a claim against the District of Columbia and the General Government, though I am not quite sure of that.

Mr. ROWELL. I should judge from the statement the gentleman has made that he was not quite sure about anything connected with the matter.

Mr. McCOMAS. Oh, yes; I have all the papers in my room, and I know all about it, except——

Mr. ROWELL. Except what you do not know.

Mr. McCOMAS. Except that I do not happen to have the paper here giving the date of the passage of the law to which I have referred.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether, if this claim should be maintained against the District of Columbia, there would be any obligation upon the part of the Federal Government to pay any portion of it?

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes; one-half of the money.

Mr. RYAN. Then I think the Government has quite a large interest in it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Can the gentleman inform the House what corps of Government counsel are already engaged. To whose department does this litigation naturally fall?

Mr. McCOMAS. There is no one to take special charge of the matter. As that letter said, it involves a very large sum of money, it covers 5,500 pages of printed testimony, with an immense amount of documents and exhibits, and over a hundred witnesses, and the only force to take charge of the District law business is the counsel and the assistant counsel authorized by law, which force is already overworked and can not give time and attention to the interests of the Government in this litigation. They are overworked now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. How many gentlemen learned in the law are in that department?

Mr. McCOMAS. There is the attorney, the assistant attorney, and the law clerk. They have their hands full. The effect will be, unless this provision is made, that the contractor will arbitrate in his own interest, and nobody can appear to take charge of the interests of the Government.

Mr. SPINOLA. I simply wish to say in reply to what the gentleman from Maryland has said that the facts he alleges and the points he makes in regard to this claim are a very considerable way outside of the record of the case. In the first place, the four suits which arose between Samuel Strong and the District of Columbia, and were decided in the courts of the District, in every single case went against the District, Strong beating the District in every suit, but in each case by some means or other the suits were set aside and sent back for a retrial.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What was the controversy about?

Mr. SPINOLA. The controversy was with regard to work and material furnished under eleven or twelve contracts between Mr. Strong and the District of Columbia. Strong performed his labor and furnished material to the entire satisfaction of all the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they so certified on the completion of the work. There is no question that the work was done and done faithfully and well. The contracts on their face called for the payment for the labor and material in the current money of the United States, and it also required of Mr. Strong that he should pay his bills in the same kind of money. Mr. Strong never received from the District of Columbia or its representatives one single solitary dollar in the current money of the United States, but they forced him to accept certificates of indebtedness of the District to the amount of $170,000 or $180,000 in part payment of his claim, which he was compelled to sacrifice at the then current value of the certificates and at the same price at which they were being paid out to other persons, that is to say, 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. But he waived that loss.

Mr. SPINOLA. And Mr. Strong in the bill which passed Congress and went to the President and was approved waived that part of the claim and agreed to accept the certificates at their face value, thus making to himself an enormous loss which he should not have been compelled or expected to meet.

The delay growing out of this business was the constant litigation in the courts over it, running through a period of fourteen years, has impoverished him in his old age, for he is now seventy-eight years of age, and not a word of complaint has been urged against him in opposition to the claim. He built this and the other wing of the Capitol and never in any public work in this country was better and more faithful work done. Not only did he do work here of that kind, but wherever his work has been done throughout the city it has been faithful and accurate and satisfactory, and yet notwithstanding that he has done this work for the District for which these claims are made, he has never been able to secure a settlement and they have nearly driven him to his grave with their constant irritation and annoyance. These cases have occupied the attention of the courts for a long time. One of them occupied seventy-nine working days of the court, at the end of which time the court took the case from before the jury on the ground that the contract was null and void from the fact that there was no appropriation made at the time the contract was signed.

It was appealed to the court in banc and the court in banc unanimously reversed the decision after seventy-nine days had been wasted. It then came up for trial again, and some three weeks were consumed, the jury giving a verdict of $130,000 or $140,000.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What was the verdict for?

Mr. SPINOLA. It was for the difference due him for work performed and material furnished—the balance which he was entitled to. Then, after three weeks more before another jury, he got a verdict of $130,000 or $140,000. The district appealed, and the appellate court overruled the action of the court below upon the ground that the judge was drunk, and that has been the finding of the law. It was then sent back to three arbitrators and they gave a verdict for two hundred and odd thousand dollars, and that was set aside because of the difference between the face value of the certificates and their actual value.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. They had not given him enough.

Mr. SPINOLA. That is all of it. And now, after spending $16,000 of the people's money, and after having compelled this poor old man to fight for fourteen years, they rob him of his just dues. That is a good deal like the legal justice that is to be obtained in the District of Columbia. And after all this they seek to persecute this old man; and this person has sent that impudent communication—impudent is the lightest expression I can use in connection with it—undertaking to reprimand the House of Representatives for passing this bill. He is a shyster of the very worst character. He is not the one to say who the arbitrators shall be. That is left to the President to determine.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Do I understand that each of the judgments was in favor of Mr. Strong?

Mr. SPINOLA. The decisions were in favor of Mr. Strong every time. The Chair has ruled the motion out; and therefore I leave the balance of the argument for future consideration, if the case does come up.

Mr. McCOMAS. Has the Chair ruled that under the law money can not be appropriated to pay counsel representing the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if special counsel should be employed under a special act that law would have appropriated money for that purpose. This being a special act, the Chair would construe it strictly; and it not allowing additional expenditure to be incurred, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, before line 7, insert:

"To enable the commissioners of the District of Columbia to repair and reconstruct such portion of the police, fire-alarm, and police telegraph lines of the District of Columbia as may be in their opinion absolutely necessary, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, said sum to be available until March 4, 1889."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this part of the bill now?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCOMAS. I also ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, after line 18, insert:

"Telegraph and telephone service of the District of Columbia: To pay the Standard Under-ground Cable Company for under-ground cable laid in the year 1883, and since used by the District government for fire-alarm, $2,951.70."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this paragraph for the purpose of considering the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEEL. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 27, and after line 4 I desire to make the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, after line 4, insert:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay over to the duly authorized treasurer of the Creek Nation the sum of $860.59, now standing to the credit of the Creek orphan fund on the books of the Treasury, being the aggregate sum due the orphans or their heirs under the treaty of March 24, 1832, and the provisions of an act entitled 'An act to reimburse the Creek orphans' fund,' approved August 7, 1882, and that the receipt of the treasurer of the Creek Nation shall be a release to the United States and considered a final settlement of the Creek orphan matter.'

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that the communication which I send to the Clerk's desk may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., February 25, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to a letter addressed to this office by the Creek delegation now in this city (copy herewith), dated the 14th instant, calling attention to the fact that the sum of $860.59, being the aggregate of small amounts of interest and balances due to certain Creek orphans and their heirs, was duly appropriated by Congress in 1882 and still remains unpaid to those who are justly entitled to it.

The act of appropriation approved August 7, 1882 (22 Stats., 302), makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to see that the amounts due are paid to the actual beneficiaries, and this has worked to delay and obstruct the proper disbursement of this balance. The delegates state that the beneficiaries are scattered over their entire domain, that many of them are poor people and unable to visit the agency at such times as the agent has been ready to make the disbursement.

Further, that the amounts due to some are so small that the expense attending travel to and from the agency to receive it, would be greater than the amount to be received, and for this reason it has been impossible to make payments. They suggest that if the entire balance was paid to their national treasurer, the beneficiaries being notified could, in their own time and convenience, receive their dues and ask that Congress be requested to authorize the payment of said balance to their treasurer, whose receipt for the same shall be a final settlement of the Creek orphan matter.

In connection with this petition I have to state that the facts set forth are correct, and this office has on several occasions placed this balance in the hands of the several Creek agents for disbursement, but that owing to the difficulties attending the payment, the sums due in many instances being only a few cents, and the claimants being scattered all over the Creek reservation, the amount was returned to the United States Treasury.

As this small sum accrued under their treaty of March 24, 1832, and has been appropriated in fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and referring to a similar balance of like character, belonging to the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees, the payment of which Congress granted authority to be made to the treasurer of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees by the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1885 (23 Stats., 367), I respectfully recommend that the attention of Congress be invited to the subject, with a view to authorize the payment of the amount to the treasurer of the Creek Nation by an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill under the title "Fulfilling treaty with Creeks."

I submit herewith a draught of the proposed amendment.

Very respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The Clerk read as follows:

French spoliation claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the desire of the committee that this part of the bill shall now be read through?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment yesterday to come in on page 36 of the bill, but it was objected to. It was an amendment providing for the payment of $50 to the messenger to the Select Committee to Investigate the Government Printing Office. I now ask unanimous consent to present the amendment again, remarking that while I take no exception to the amount of money provided to pay the clerk of the committee, I think that all the work performed for that investigating committee should be paid for.

"To pay Edward S. McDonald for services rendered the Select Committee for Investigating the Government Printing Office, $50."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to considering this amendment at this time?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYES. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to come in on page 36.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To equalize the salaries and pay of forty-three persons engaged in the performance of the duties of messengers of the House of Representatives, as mentioned and designated in House Miscellaneous Document 263, Fiftieth Congress, first session, $4,582; said sum to be so applied as to make the compensation of each of said persons as nearly as may be $100 per month for the time they are so employed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa to return to this part of the bill for the purpose of offering this amendment?

Mr. KERR. I object. I objected yesterday, and I would like to know what reason there is for this amendment to the law. It seems to me that if the compensation of these employés is not sufficient, it ought to be increased by a general law, and that those who have control of legislation here ought to assume the responsibility of making an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] objects.

Mr. GEAR. I do not understand the gentleman to object. He asks for an explanation.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make an inquiry.

Mr. KERR. I did not withdraw my objection.

Mr. GEAR. I understood that while the gentleman objected, he also asked for an explanation. Perhaps if the explanation were made, he might withdraw his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Regular order.

Mr. BURNES. Having now reached that part of the bill which relates to French spoliations, as they are called, I do not know that it is necessary to take up time by reading all of the provisions of the appropriations asked for; but I desire to inform the Chair that at the proper time, whenever that may be, I shall move to strike out those provisions and shall also submit a point of order against the proposition. I do not know whether that point of order ought to be made now or when the provisions are read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that under the practice which has prevailed heretofore, general debate on a bill always precedes the consideration of questions of order in relation to any particular provision in the bill. By an order of the committee heretofore made, the general debate upon this section of the bill was fixed at four hours and a half upon each side, and the commiteee has now reached the point when such debate is in order. After the general debate, the Chair will entertain any proposition that is parliamentary, or any point of order that may be made upon the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. This section is now before the committee for general debate.

Mr. BURNES. Then it will not be necessary to move to strike out each paragraph, but after the general debate they can be all taken together.

The CHAIRMAN. After the general debate has been exhausted the committee will proceed to consider this part of the bill under the five-minute rule, just as other portions of it have been heretofore considered, and it will be subject to all points of order and all motions that are in order under that procedure.

Mr. BURNES. I ask that the Clerk read the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee having waived the first reading of the whole bill, the Chair is of opinion that the reading of this section is not now in order. General debate having proceeded upon the other parts of the bill heretofore, general debate may now proceed upon this section under the previous order.

After the general debate has been exhausted the gentleman may then call for the reading of the paragraphs, to be considered under the five-minute rule. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts on the left [Mr. LONG] to control the time in favor of sustaining section 4 of the bill, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURNES. We have the right, Mr. Chairman, to the opening and conclusion.

Mr. LONG. I understand that the opening is with this side.

Mr. BURNES. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. LONG. We have the affirmative of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now raised is a novel one. Of course it is generally assumed that those who report a bill have the affirmative of the proposition——

Mr. LONG. But in this case they do not. In this case those who report the bill are expressly against the subject-matter now in controversy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer that this debate should proceed, reserving the question as to who will have the conclusion of the general debate upon this whole section. The question as to which side has the affirmative is a point the Chair has not heretofore considered.

Mr. DIBBLE. Is the Chair about to decide the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was stating the question presented, as to which side has the opening and closing.

Mr. DIBBLE. On that I have a word to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DIBBLE. On the point of order as to who is entitled to open and close the debate on the subject of the French spoliation claims, I submit that by the unanimous order of the House general debate on the other sections of the bill has already been closed; and the debate in this instance is not general debate on the whole bill. The general debate has been subdivided into two parts, one portion being the general debate on the bill itself. As to that of course the gentleman who reported the bill had the opening and the reply. But, Mr. Chairman, the House, by unanimous consent, has made general debate on the French spoliation claims a matter by itself. I submit, therefore, that this is a subject disconnected from the general debate on the bill and placed under an order of its own, so that the question which the Chair must decide in considering who is to have the opening and closing in this debate resolves itself into the inquiry, who maintains the affirmative of the proposition submitted to the House under its own instruction? The party who aims to strike out or to amend, who is opposed to the bill as it stands, certainly should not have control of what has been reported under the instruction of the House and made by order of the House the subject of general debate.

Suppose that the Committee on Appropriations had regularly divided on this subject, and filed a majority and a minority report—and they have done very nearly that. The committee, as a committee, reported this proposition; but the gentleman who is in control of the bill on the floor files a minority report, and is endeavoring now to strike out from the bill, to undo or to amend what the committee has done under the action of the House. He is hostile to this bill. Under the general parliamentary provision that a bill is to be in the hands of its friends, I submit that a member of the Appropriations Committee who represents the report of the committee on this side is entitled, as the representative of the committee, to control the debate.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the postponement of the debate on the French spoliation claims to this stage of the bill was a mere matter of convenience to both sides of the House, adopted on the suggestion of the gentleman who controls the bill. But for the suggestion on his part that the general debate on this subject should be postponed until we reached this section, no one would contend that this provision would not stand upon the same basis with other provisions in the bill.

Now, no principle is better established than that those in the affirmative of a proposition have a right to open and close. I say that the gentleman from Missouri in charge of the bill, when he made this arrangement for the convenience of both sides, waived nothing; and he stands now exactly as he would have stood if the general debate had proceeded regularly in the beginning. The mere fact that he has adapted himself to the convenience of both sides ought not to deprive him of the right to control his own bill in his own way, in accordance with parliamentary law.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, if this were a bill solely with reference to the French spoliation claims, then the parties supporting it would have the affirmative—would be entitled to open and close. The gentleman from Missouri, being opposed to the measure, would have neither the opening nor the closing of the debate.

At this moment, by the unanimous consent of the House, this is a bill having reference solely to the French spoliation claims. All other portions have been, as it were, eliminated from the bill, or settled, leaving only that portion to which I have referred. The House by its own action some time ago decided that this part of the bill shall be an entirety—an integrity by itself—and that there shall be general debate upon it, which is followed of course under the rule by the five minutes' debate on paragraphs. So that technically this is a matter, the opening and closing of debate, which should be in the hands of its friends. So much for the technicality. Practically and in fact how ridiculous it is, that those members who are opposed to these claims and bound to do their utmost to defeat them here should have what is never accorded to the defendant or opponent of a measure, the opening and the closing. It seems to me that both technically and fairly as a matter of right the opening and close of the debate should be in the hands of the friends of the measure, and the only measure which is at stake now, that is, the French spoliation claims as embodied in this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to say one single word. The question in this case seems to be what is the affirmative of the proposition. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], usually so clear upon such matters, seems to think that the affirmative of the proposition is that this provision shall not stay in the bill. I never knew a negative affirmative before.

Mr. BURNES. I appeal to my friend from Massachusetts, as a fair man, and a gentleman who I know never resorts to any method which has a semblance of unfairness in order to secure any advantage, not to insist upon the claim that he makes. He and I, I believe, made the arrangement about which the debate was postponed, and neither of us then contemplated, nor did I undertake, to waive any right to which the committee was entitled in regard to the control of the bill. As a matter of course he will not ask, therefore, that anything that has occurred that gives him a right which he would not have had if we had considered this bill in the regular manner shall be insisted upon.

Now, we hold the affirmative, to say the least of it, that is to say, the burden is upon us to sustain our position, and holding that position we are entitled to the opening and closing of the argument.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] said that the minority reported against the claims. The gentleman should have said that the majority of the committee had reported against the claims, a majority of nine against six; so that holding the affirmative, sir, complying with what was alleged to be an order of the House, complying with that order and reporting these claims here against the judgment of the majority of the committee in respect to the action of the House, surely it will not be claimed that we lose control of our own bill or the mode of conducting the argument in reference to it.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was delivered to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, returning without his approval the bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury.

The message also announced the approval of bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. Res. No. 206) to continue the provisions of a joint resolution approved June 30, 1888, entitled "Joint resolution to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government;"

An act (H. R. No. 1338) to extend the leave of absence of employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days per annum;

An act (H. R. 10053) making May 30 a holiday in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. 6153) to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 8183) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La.;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y.; and

An act (H. R. 8180) to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the Senate the enrolled bill (S. 3303) amendatory of an act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, approved June 18, 1888.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, this is a question of parliamentary practice merely; and in its present shape it may be compared with a matter pending before a court in regard to the opening and closing arguments to the jury, which is regarded as a matter of so much importance that most States of the Union have decided that it is an error for the court to improperly deprive a party of the opening and the closing to the jury. I stand upon the proposition that nothing has been gained and nothing waived by unanimous consent in regard to this matter. I do not know what the Chair will hold in regard to that; and to my mind it does not affect the question one way or the other.

There are two questions presented: First, what is the real issue now before us? and, second, who has the burden of proof, as you may say, on that question? This bill has been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and the issue before the committee is the passage of the bill in the form in which it comes before the House from that committee. That is the affirmative of the proposition, and the side that is seeking to do something, that is the side that has the probative attitude to the bill. The other side stand in the attitude of opposing this provision in the bill, trying to strike the provision from the bill. One side argues in favor of retaining the provision, the other in favor of striking it out. Now, who shall control the debate? Manifestly that side which proposes legislation. The side which seeks to eliminate it opposes legislation. So if the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is true, and nobody can refute it, that this principle always applies, then the parties seeking to do something represent the affirmative; and manifestly those who seek to accomplish some provision of legislation here must have the affirmative, and hence the opening and close. The committee does not lose control of the bill. They only lose it if the majority of this Committee of the Whole are opposed to this section of the bill. It would not appear here then, and would not be in the bill. Therefore for the purpose of the parliamentary question now involved it must be assumed that the committee is in favor of the section of the bill as it stands.

So they seek to have that retained in the bill, or else it would not be there. Now, they have the affirmative on that question, and the opponents of it stand simply as if they were opposing in general debate the whole bill instead of one section.

Mr. COX. As I understand the relation of this case, the committee reports these French spoliation claims by order of the House. It is not of their own will or consent, but they are placed on the bill by the committee perfunctorily, carrying out the order of the House. That committee does not lose charge of the bill because of that order of the House. The bill is reported here and they are responsible here for the bill, and although it may not matter which side may close the debate, for we are not in the position of a jury, nevertheless, the position is that the majority of the members of the Appropriations Committee do not favor the proposition to pay these French spoliation claims. They hold the affirmative on the bill and move affirmatively to strike out, and that question is the only question.

Mr. LONG. But that motion is not made, and that can only be made under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COX. It is just the same, for it will be done. That is the relation. In the debate they will move to strike out. Logically the motion to strike out will follow, as it already appears on the part of the majority of the committee that nine have voted to strike out and six for it to remain. Therefore, I believe in a forum of this kind the majority should control its own bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to me that this is a very easy matter to decide. The question is to determine first what rights the committee had originally in regard to the closing of debate. The mere fact that the debate on this section was postponed, was only a matter of convenience, and did not in any way deprive the committee of the rights it would have had if the debate had been concluded in regular order. The only question is what rights the committee had on the original debate.

The CHAIRMAN. In the general debate which heretofore took place on this bill, section 4 was passed over under a previous order of the House. During the pendency of the general debate it is not in order to make any motion to strike out or insert an amendment. These motions are in order after the general debate is concluded. At present the general debate is as to agreeing to this part of the bill, and the Chair is of the opinion that the affirmative of that issue is with those who desire the bill to pass in that shape, and therefore holds that side should have the opening and closing of the debate. But the Chair does not entertain any point of order as to the right to recognize any individual. That is the prerogative of the Chair which the committee can not control.

But on the question of the subject-matter the Chair is of the opinion that those who are in favor of the bill as it stands are entitled to make the opening and closing speeches, and without reference to individuals the Chair will recognize gentlemen in that order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has informed the Chair that he desires to retain the bill in its present shape, and he being a member of the Committee on Appropriations the Chair will recognize him to control the time in favor of the bill standing as it is, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will be recognized to control the time in opposition to that part of the bill. Under the order of the House the debate on this part of the bill is limited to four and a half hours upon each side of the question, and it now begins at thirteen minutes to 3 o'clock.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Are we to understand that the decision of the Chair refers merely to this period of time—four and a half hours on each side of this subject—and that it does not affect the original right of the gentleman in charge of the bill to conclude the general debate upon this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which, so far as it concerns the French spoliations, involves nothing of a political or a sectional character. It is not political, for it is founded on a just claim older than any existing political party. To-day Republicans and Democrats alike recognize its justice and support it. It is not sectional, for it is for the payment of money due men who lived all along the coast of the thirteen original States, from New Hampshire to Georgia, and whose descendants, now scattered throughout the Union, demand its passage.

During the last eighty years it has been favorably reported to Congress some forty or fifty times by successive committees. It is said there have been but two reports against it. It was indeed vetoed by President Polk, but, if I remember aright, mainly on the ground that the country, then under the heavy expense of the Mexican war, could not easily add to its financial burden. It was afterward vetoed by President Pierce, but his argument against it has been so overwhelmingly overthrown by the repeated determinations of Congress and recently by the solemn judgments of our courts that the last obstacle now in the way of its righteous consummation can only be an obstinate refusal on the part of its opponents to pay an honest debt.

In 1885, after full discussion in Congress, these claims were referred to the United States Court of Claims. Special appropriations were made to enable the Government to obtain all possible evidence, and also to marshal the most ample array of legal research and ability in resisting them. They have been ably contested and no stone has been left unturned in the attempt to defeat them. The court, after the most careful consideration, has decided in favor of their validity and of the solemn obligation of the United States to pay them. On request, the court has even reopened the case, heard further and still more elaborate argument, and has a second time, with the same unanimity and with added emphasis, affirmed its first judgment. Its awards carry no interest, though payment has been dishonestly delayed nearly a century, and though the men, whose Government has robbed them, have gone down to their graves.

If any excuse for this has heretofore existed it exists no longer, in view of the fact that a judicial decision by a tribunal of our own deliberate preference and selection has, as a conclusion alike of fact and of law, declared their validity and our indebtedness. Not to pay them now is repudiation, ugly and scandalous repudiation.

The present Committee on Appropriations have, as instructed by the House, reported in the pending bill several amounts found by the court to be due. Some individual members of that committee have filed, not a report, but a statement of adverse views. I think it can hardly be called a statement of their views, because the subject of the merits of these claims was never for one moment considered in the committee or in any subcommittee thereof. The statement above referred to appeared at the committee's table only in the last few minutes before it arose to report the bill. It was not read, and the gentlemen who have signed it claim only that it is a matter of mere individual action.

I do not even know who drew it. I make of course no complaint of its presentation, but I claim that under these circumstances it is entitled to no other consideration than that of an expression of individual opinion. I presume, too, that some of the gentlemen who signed it did so with only a hasty reading of it and with no contemporaneous study of the argument on the other side or of the opinion of the court, which is dead against the statement they have signed. In short, Mr. Chairman, it is simply a reproduction of some of the arguments of counsel and has been not only refuted by the forty or fifty previous reports of Congress and by the declarations of Madison, Clay, Marshall, Webster, Sumner, and others, but it is now declared by the court itself to be unfounded and entirely in error. I think we may let it go, and I think, too, that a careful reading of it will show that it is one of those labored, strained, and hair-splitting performances that are always a necessity when ingenuity and refinement endeavor to escape the force of a plain, strong, impregnable case.

The usual bugbear has been raised that these claims will involve judgments to the extent of thirty or forty millions of dollars. If that were true, it would still be unworthy of an honest government to let it stand in the way of paying an honest debt, unless we adopt the convenient policy that the more a man embezzles the more reason there is why he should go scot-free. But the best estimate is that the amount will not exceed $10,000,000. Mr. Webster, who had excellent opportunities for knowing, made that estimate. But to offset even that estimate, it must be remembered that the court has already thrown out all captures made after September, 1800, when the treaty was signed; and the list of claims embrace some hundreds which occurred between that date and the ratification of the treaty in July, 1801.

The number of claims now filed is a most untrustworthy index of the amount recoverable. After the lapse of eighty-eight years every family whose ancestor ever lost a ship rushes to the conclusion that it was a French spoliation, covered by the act of 1885. Hundreds of such claims are filed which belong to an entirely different class and have no status. In hundreds of others there is no proof, as some of the findings by the court already show, not even the masters' names being known. Others have been settled and paid from other provisions. Under the two years' limitation for presenting claims it also appears that parties, guessing as a matter of family tradition that sums were due them, have filed blanket petitions, putting in claims for a round $100,000 as a lawyer makes the ad damnum of a writ ten times as much as he ever hopes to recover, so as to be sure to include any possible contingency; and the larger the blanket in these chance throwings of the net the greater the probability that there is no claim at all. Add to these considerations the fact that it is only the best and surest cases that have been pushed first and so first reported, and that many even of them have been rejected by the Court of Claims, and the conclusion becomes most reasonable which estimates the total recoverable amount of these claims at not exceeding $10,000,000 and perhaps not more than $7,000,000.

These claims are for the spoliation of American vessels by the French from 1793 to 1801. These spoliations were by the French grounded on the failure of American vessels to comply with certain arbitrary municipal regulations, not warranted by international law, but made by France in contemptuous arrogance of power and without justification so far as our rights were concerned. On the high seas our vessels, with no public enemy in the world, engaged in peaceful commerce, were boarded, captured, robbed, and sometimes sunk, and millions of our property taken and confiscated. Our Government continually protested and demanded satisfaction. For years negotiations were pending, but we were met by a counter-claim by France. Her claim was, first, that by the treaties of alliance and of commerce of 1778, when we were willing to give almost anything for aid in our Revolutionary struggle, we agreed to guaranty to France her West India possessions and to grant France privileges in our ports not granted to her enemies; and that, second, we had plainly violated these agreements to her great damage. These were the two respective and opposing claims that were then pending.

We never for one moment abated our claim; and that we recognized that of France is best shown by the fact that one of our ministers to France, Mr. Ellsworth, acting by authority, offered her 8,000,000 francs to relieve us from it, which offer was refused as totally inadequate. The French negotiators insisted upon this one final alternative—either that the treaties of 1778 should be revived, with all the obligations they imposed on the United States, and in return indemnity should be made by France for the spoliation of our vessels; or that an entirely new treaty should be made, abrogating the old treaty on the one hand and waiving the spoliation indemnity on the other. The first proposition we could not accept, because the burden of the guaranties of the old treaties the United States could not and would not carry. To the second we came at last, as I now proceed to show.

It was under these circumstances that the French and American negotiators formulated a treaty. It embraced, of course, other issues, but as to these mutual claims it provided in its famous second article as follows:

SEC. 2. The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of 14th November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further upon those subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon those points the said treaties and convention shall have no operation.

In other words, each side recognizing the existence of the claim of the other, to wit, the claim of American citizens on account of French spoliations and the claim of France on account of our violation of the treaties of alliance and commerce, it was agreed that these claims should await further negotiation at some future convenient time.

When the full treaty came before the Senate for confirmation, it was confirmed with a proviso striking out this second article. The French Government then also ratified it, consenting to the omission of the second article, but with a further declaration that by that omission the two countries renounced the respective mutual claims which were the subject of the second article.

This further declaration was then submitted by President Jefferson to our Senate, which confirmed it, and the President thereupon promulgated the treaty as a valid contract.

Gentlemen opposed to this bill find some difficulty in accounting for the action of the Senate in striking out the original second article in the treaty. It is as plain as day that the purpose rose from the unwillingness of our Senators to further delay the settlement of our claims, and their wisdom is seen in the fact that their action soon resulted in the payment of those claims, not in money, but in what was worth more than their money-value, to wit, the release to us by France of our burdensome obligations under the treaties of 1778. For mark now that the result was that, in place of the original second article, which deferred the settlement of these mutual claims, there was adopted a practically new second article to the effect that each country renounced its claims against the other. In other words, taking advantage of the well-settled principle that private property may be taken for the public use, the United States deliberately and by solemn act of its President and Senate took the property of its citizens, which consisted of clear claims against France for utterly unwarranted and outrageous spoliation of their vessels, and with this property bought off the valid claim which France had against us for the guaranties we had given her.

It is said by the other side to-day, in their adverse "views," that our despoiled citizens gave up nothing, because their claims against France, though just claims, were only claims, and that she never would have paid them, but would have put them off and would have snapped her fingers in our faces.

Mr. Chairman, allow me to say that that is a contemptibly unpatriotic and cowardly admission, and I do not believe it will weigh even in the days of this Administration. But more than that, it is not only craven but it is not true. I do not care, for the purposes of this case, whether France would have paid those claims of ours afterwards or not, because the fact is she did pay them then and there, and for the price she paid we are bound to account to those for whose indemnity it was paid. France gave to us, I undertake to say, an ample quid pro quo. We had already offered 8,000,000 francs for what she gave us, and she had refused it. She wanted more, and that more took the form of a release from those spoliation claims. Think what it was she released to us! We had in 1778 not only agreed that in her wars she might bring her prizes into our ports and that her enemies should not have that privilege, an agreement we had broken by the Jay treaty with Great Britain and in other ways, but we also had agreed that we would guaranty to her her West India possessions. It was worth millions to us to have the burden of this guaranty removed from our backs. Of this there is no better evidence than that about that time, if I remember aright, England wrested some of these very possessions from France. I know it is said that we had released ourselves from these obligations to France by an act of Congress in 1798 abrogating the guaranty of 1778. But it is unnecessary to say that one of two parties to a contract can not annul it, and that the passage of this very act was one of the grievances which France had against us. There is no better authority than Mr. Madison, who was Secretary of State when the treaty was ratified, and who said:

The claims from which France was released were admitted by France, and the release was a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them.

Funnily enough, the only way my friends who have signed these adverse "views" now meet this conclusive statement of Mr. Madison, is to say that it is "inaccurate" and to intimate that he did not know what he was talking about. On the whole, with all good-natured deference—although they are "bigger" men than old Madison—I prefer his dictum to theirs, especially as he gave official attention to the matter, and I am sure that some of them have been so busy with Congressional work that they have given very little. Pickering, the predecessor of Madison, Henry Clay in his official capacity as one of his successors, John Marshall, Livingston, and the great authorities of that time are all on record to the same effect. Still more significant is the language of Napoleon at Saint Helena (see page 129, volume 2, of General Gourgand's Memoirs of Napoleon):

The suppression of this article—

The original second article of the treaty—

at once put an end to the privileges which France had possessed by the treaty of 1778, and annulled the just claims which America might have made for injuries done in time of peace. This was exactly what the First Consul had proposed to himself in fixing these two points as equiponderating each other. Without this it would have been impossible to satisfy the merchants of the United States and to banish from their memory the losses they had suffered.

In other words, France gave and paid an "equiponderating" quid pro quo to the United States as indemnity for the spoliations she had committed on our vessels. Even if she had paid nothing, yet we had used the private property of our citizens to buy her off; and the only question left is, whether after the lapse of eighty-eight years, after enjoying this property or fund, the principal only of which it is proposed to account for, and after our obligation to pay it over has been judicially declared by our courts, we will pay it over, and thus, as required by the Constitution, compensate our citizens whose private property we have taken for a public use, or whether we will repudiate the obligation and dishonor the public faith and credit.

The main argument against these claims is that there was a war between France and the United States which extinguished them. The answer to that is, first, that a war between two nations does not necessarily extinguish claims which the private citizens of one nation have against the other nation; and, second, that in fact no war ever existed. What history of the United States has a chapter on the "war with France?" How can there have been a war when no declaration of war was ever made by either nation and no treaty of peace negotiated between them? During the whole of that period French citizens came and went in our country and in our courts freely, and there was no suspension of the general relations of peace. We did indeed prepare for war, but it was under the good rule, "in peace prepare for war." We inaugurated what the Supreme Court, in the cases cited by the other side, call a partial or limited war, but the same court expressly held that it did not create a general war, or give authority to commit hostilities on land, or to capture unarmed French vessels. Congress simply authorized our armed vessels to arrest any French armed vessel found despoiling our commerce, just as a policeman may arrest a burglar. Congress afterwards, also, in several acts, authorized an increase of our Army, but with the express provision that these acts should take effect only in case of war, thus recognizing that there was no war as yet. It passed non-intercourse acts, but non-intercourse acts are not passed with reference to a nation with which we are at war. The very decrees under which the French condemned our vessels were decrees against "neutral" vessels. The very instructions given by our Government to our minister to France in 1799, at the very height of the trouble, embraced the following language:

This conduct of the French Republic would have justified an immediate declaration of war on the part of the United States; but desirous of maintaining peace, and still willing to leave open the door of reconciliation with France, the United States contented themselves with preparations for defense and measures calculated to protect their commerce.

Also, in 1800, after the treaty was signed, the French minister wrote to ours as follows:

That the treaties that united France and the United States are not broken; that even war could not have broken them; but that the state of misunderstanding which has existed for some time between France and the United States by the acts of some agents, rather than by the will of the respective Governments, has not been a state of war, at least on the side of France.

But, Mr. Chairman, the fact is, it is a matter of no consequence whether there had been war or not. Suppose there had been a general war, which there was not; here were claims on one side for indemnity for spoliations, and on the other for violation of treaty. That these claims were not extinguished by the war, even if there had been war, is conclusively and absolutely proven by the fact that when the treaty was made and signed in 1800 both parties recognized in the original Article II the claims as still existing and not extinguished, but as a matter for future negotiation and settlement; and both parties, in afterward withdrawing said article and substituting for it another provision, expressly agreed to offset these claims one against the other.

Could they offset claims unless they existed? Could anything be more supremely absurd than to argue that after difficulties, whether amounting to war or lawsuit or negotiation, between two nations or two individuals have come to a settlement, the very claims existing between them and for the future negotiation of which that settlement distinctly provided, have been extinguished? In other words, that to provide for the future settlement of claims is to admit that no claims exist? It is a reductio ad absurdum.

Now, I have only run along the salient points of the case. I know the difficulty of going nicely into the record of intricate international dispute, with its cumbrous mass of diplomatic correspondence, and of making things clear and holding attention in a hurried debate. I have therefore attempted only to follow the vital thread of the whole issue. Following that, I believe no plainer case ever existed or one more easily understood. I have tried to disembarrass it of points which are not absolutely pertinent to it, and with which the adverse "views" only confuse it.

I am aware that the other side raise other objections, arising from the Louisiana purchase of 1803 and the question of the underwriters, and so on and so on. It is enough for me to say, that all these objections, and many more, all that ingenuity, research, and ability could raise were raised in the recent trial over and over again by the ablest counsel this Government could employ, and with a thoroughness and extent which no gentleman here can rival or even approach, burdened as he is with his Congressional duties. These objections have been raised, argued, urged upon the court. The court has considered them. In elaborate and unanimous opinion, to which I invite the conscientious attention of members, that court has met every one of them, discussed every one of them, answered every one of them, and then affirmed and reaffirmed its judgment for the claimants.

Unless we sit here, Mr. Chairman, to make a travesty of justice and in a conspiracy to shield the United States from discharging its just obligations to its own citizens; unless we wish to announce to the world that the American idea of a trust-fund is that the trustee may convert it to his own use on the free-booter's

Simple plan
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can;

unless we deliberately intend that dishonor, there is but one thing for us to do, and that is to execute the judgment of our own tribunal, and, even if it take the last farthing—thank God, it will take but a drop from our overflowing cup—to pay the debt which that tribunal has solemnly declared we owe. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

Copy of the instructions to Oliver Ellsworth, William Richardson Davie, and William Vans Murray, esquires, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the French Republic, dated October 22, 1799.

GENTLEMEN: You have been witnesses of the enduring patience of the United States, under the unexampled aggressions and hostilities authorized and sanctioned by the French Republic against the commerce and citizens of the United States. And you are well informed of the measures adopted by our Government to put a stop to these evils, to obtain redress for the injured, and real peace and security to our country. And you know that instead of relief, instead of justice, instead of indemnity for past wrongs, our very moderate demands have been immediately followed by new aggressions and more extended depredations; while our ministers, seeking redress and reconciliation, have been refused a reception, treated with indignities, and finally driven from its territories.

This conduct of the French Republic would well have justified an immediate declaration of war on the part of the United States; but desirous of maintaining peace, and still willing to leave open the door of reconciliation with France, the United States contented themselves with preparations for defense and measures calculated to protect their commerce.

The treatment experienced by the former envoys of the United States to the French Republic having determined the President not to send thither other ministers without direct and unequivocal assurances, previously signified by its minister of foreign relations, that they would be received in character to an audience of the Directory, and that they should enjoy all the prerogatives attached to that character by the law of nations, and that a minister or ministers of equal powers should be appointed and commissioned to treat with them, the French Government, by Mr. Talleyrand, its minister of foreign relations, has declared that it will receive the envoys of the United States in the official character with which they are invested; that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives attached to it by the law of nations, and that one or more ministers shall be duly authorized to treat with them.

This the President deems to be substantially the assurance which he required as the previous condition of the envoys entering on their mission. It now belongs to you, gentlemen, to see that this assurance be verified. Your country will not submit to any new indignity or neglect. It is expected when you shall have assembled at Paris and have given official notice of it to the minister of foreign relations that you will be received to an audience of the Executive Directory. That a minister, or ministers, with powers equal to your own, will be appointed to treat with you, and that within twenty days at farthest after your arrival at Paris your negotiation will be commenced. If, however, your passports to Paris should be unreasonably withheld, if an audience of the directory should be denied or procrastinated, if the appointment of a minister or ministers with equal powers to treat with you should be delayed, or if when appointed they postpone the intended negotiation, you are to relinquish your mission, demand your passports, and leave France; and having once resolved to terminate the mission you are not to resume it, whatever fresh overtures or assurances may be tendered to you by the French Government.

One more limitation: The subjects of difference between the United States and France have often been discussed and are well understood, and therefore admit of a speedy decision. The negotiation is expected to be concluded in such time that you may certainly embark for the United States by the 1st of next April. This is highly important, in order that on your return Congress may be found in session to take those measures which the result of your mission shall require. If it can be earlier concluded it will be still better.

If any of the periods above mentioned should be prolonged, with your assent, it is expected that the circumstances will be stated for your justification.

First. At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers that the United States expect from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents. And all captures and condemnations are deemed irregular or illegal when contrary to the law of nations, generally received and acknowledged in Europe, and to the stipulations in the treaty of amity and commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, fairly and ingeniously interpreted, while that treaty remained in force; especially when made and pronounced.

1. Because the vessel's lading, or any part thereof, consisted of provisions or merchandise coming from England or her possessions.

2. Because the vessels were not provided with the rôles d'équipage prescribed by the laws of France, and which, it has been pretended, were also required by treaty.

3. Because sea-letters or other papers were wanted, or said to be wanted, when the property shall have been or shall be admitted or proved to be American. Such defect of papers, though it might justify the captors and exempt them from damages for bringing in such vessels for examination, could not with reason be a ground of condemnation.

4. When the owners, masters, or supercargoes shall have been refused a hearing, or placed in situations rendering their presence at the trials impracticable.

5. When the vessels or other property captured shall have been sold or otherwise disposed of without a regular trial and condemnation.

Captures and condemnations for such causes and under such circumstances are manifestly irregular or illegal.

The French Government, if it has any serious wish to accommodate existing differences, can make no difficulty in admitting the general proposition that for injuries arising from violated laws and engagements reparation shall be made. In every claim under this general stipulation the question will occur, has the treaty or the law of nations been violated?

But such a general stipulation will not be sufficient. The five specific propositions just stated are obviously proper rules of adjudication; but the previous admission of the first and second is vastly important to remove from hazard the most interesting claims of our citizens. To capture neutral property because it was produced or manufactured in the country of an enemy to France is so palpably unjust that it seems improbable that even the men who originated the law, were they still in power, would persist in it as of right; and it is scarcely possible for their successors to hesitate on this point. To hesitate would be to doubt whether a man has a right to occupy his own house or to wear his own clothes unless he had built the first or manufactured the last with his own hands.

The second proposition, respecting the rôle d'equipage, as well as the first, should be insisted on. Until the decree of the directory of March 2, 1797, was passed and we had felt its fatal effects we had no idea of the meaning which the French applied to the phrase rôle d'equipage.

* * * * * * *

Second. If these preliminaries should be satisfactorily arranged, then, for the purpose of examining and adjusting all the claims of our citizens, it will be necessary to provide for the appointment of a board of commissioners similar to that described in the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Great Britain.

All sums which the board may award to American claimants, France should stipulate to pay in gold and silver, without any deduction, at such place or places, and at such time or times, as the commissioners shall appoint. The awards should comprehend a reasonable allowance of interest on the amount of the original losses and damages, or, instead of prompt payment, the whole may constitute a transferable capital, bearing interest until the debt be discharged.

The board should also take cognizance of the claims, which may be presented to them by American citizens for merchandise or other property seized by the French in their own ports or elsewhere, and not comprehended under the head of captures, and for their vessels arbitrarily and unreasonably detained in French ports; and for the losses and damages thereby sustained the board should award equitable compensations to be paid in the manner prescribed in the case of captures.

The claims of the United States as distinguished from those of their citizens, for injuries received from the French Republic or its citizens, should be submitted to the same board; and whatever sums they award, France should stipulate to pay, in the manner before mentioned in the case of captures.

As the French Government have heretofore complained of infringements of the treaty of amity and commerce by the United States, or their citizens, all claims for injuries thereby occasioned to France or its citizens are to be submitted to the same board; and whatever damages they award will be allowed by the United States and deducted from the sums awarded to be paid by France.

If, however, the French Government should desire to waive its national claims you may do the like on the part of the United States. Doubtless the claims of the latter would exceed those of the former; but to avoid multiplying subjects of dispute, and because national claims may probably be less definite than those of individuals, and consequently more difficult to adjust, national claims may on both sides be relinquished.

All claims for sums due to American citizens, by contracts with the French Government or its agents, which may be presented to the board, France should stipulate to pay within the shortest periods possible to obtain, with interest at the rate or rates agreed on, or if no agreement about interest appears, then at the rate to be fixed by the board, and from the times when the sums were respectively payable by contract. This also may be transferable stock.

The questions about interest, and any other questions, which may arise out of the claims founded on contracts, not explicitly determined by the treaty, may be left to the decision of the Board of Commissioners.

Third. If the preceding claims shall be duly attended to, and adequate arrangements made for adjusting and satisfying them, you will then turn your thoughts to the regulation of navigation and commerce, and to some other points interesting to the two nations.

* * * * * * *

Twenty-seventh. The usual stipulations and treaties, designed to prevent abuses by armed vessels, have ever been found inadequate; perhaps they do not admit of a complete remedy. If, however, any nation does not provide penalties and securities whereby to restrain offenders and indemnify the injured, the nation itself ought to be responsible. Doubtless the nation should be immediately responsible for all abuses committed by national ships.

One abuse is the destruction or concealment of papers of captured vessels. A remedy for this seems practicable. The captors may be obliged to give a receipt for them upon a list of the papers, and they may also be sealed up with seals of the captors and captured.

The master and supercargo being intrusted by the owners with the vessel and cargo ought never to be separated from them. They may prevent waste and embezzlement, and on the arrival of the vessel will be ready for examination, and also to claim the property in behalf of the owners, and contest, as of right they may do, the legality of the capture.

Bribery, or an attempt to bribe any one of the ship's company or passengers, to depose to any fact tending to the condemnation of vessel or cargo, or putting any of them to torture for that or any other purpose, should absolutely procure her acquittal.

But a still greater evil remains, and more difficult to remedy, the improper institution of prize courts.

Probably no provision can be explicitly made other than that each party will take effectual care that the judgments and decrees in prize causes shall be given conformably to the rules of justice and equity, and the stipulations of the treaty, and without any unnecessary delay, by judges above all suspicion, and who have no manner of interest in the cause in dispute.

It would be some check on the judges in prize causes if their reasons for condemning were required to be stated with the other proceedings, in writing; and copies of the whole should, if demanded, be delivered to the commander or agent of the captured vessel, without the smallest delay, or at farthest within fifteen days after sentence pronounced, and sooner if practicable, and at the expense of the captors (in case of condemnation), not of the captured, who are otherwise sufficiently distressed.

Prizes, as already observed, should be conducted into the courts of the party at war or of an associate in the war, and there adjudicated by the regular tribunals. The French have conducted their prizes into neutral as well as belligerent ports; and when there was no consul to try and condemn, leaving there the prizes, they have carried the papers to a distant place to find a French tribunal; and there, in the absence of the captured party, procured sentences of condemnation, and sold the prizes. The same mode of obtaining condemnations has been uniformly practiced when they carried their prizes into the courts of an associate in the present war. But without waiting for the result of this farcical trial, it has been common to unlade and sell the cargoes as soon as they reached a port.

An unreasonable burden is imposed on the captured in requiring them, if they think proper to appeal to a higher tribunal, to find sureties in large penalties, which, as strangers, it is impossible to procure. This evil demands redress.

The crews are often stripped of their property, and even of their clothes, and turned ashore without money or provisions. Such inhuman pillage is disgraceful to the nation which permits, or does not, by adequate punishments, restrain it. The masters, supercargoes, other officers, and seamen, should be allowed certain sums, the former to employ counsel to support their claims to the property captured, and all for their subsistence; and the seamen might have an adequate allowance of good provisions until they could find vessels returning to their own country. To admit masters and supercargoes into the courts to defend the property captured, when they have been previously stripped of their money and all means of providing the legal assistance essential to a right defense, is to tantalize with the semblance of justice, while the substance is denied.

* * * * * * *

The following points are to be considered as ultimata:

First. That an article be inserted for establishing a board, with suitable powers, to hear and determine the claims of our citizens for the causes hereinbefore expressed and binding France to pay or secure payment of the sums which shall be awarded.

Second. That the treaties and consular convention, declared to be no longer obligatory by act of Congress, be not in whole or in part revived by the new treaty; but that all the engagements to which the United States are to become parties be specified in the new treaty.

Third. That no guaranty of the whole or any part of the dominion of France be stipulated, nor any engagement made in the nature of an alliance.

Fourth. That no aid or loan be promised in any form whatever.

Fifth. That no engagement be made inconsistent with the obligations of any prior treaty; and as it may respect our treaty with Great Britain, the instruction herein marked 21 is to be particularly observed.

Sixth. That no stipulation be made granting powers to consuls or others, under color of which tribunals can be established within our jurisdiction, or personal privileges be claimed by Frenchmen incompatible with the complete sovereignty of the United States in matters of policy, commerce, and government.

Seventh. That the duration of the proposed treaty be limited to twelve years at farthest from the day of the exchange of the ratifications, with the exceptions respecting its permanence in certain cases, specified under the instruction marked 30th.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, October 22, 1799.

[Decree of the National Convention of 19th February, 1793.]

ARTICLE I. That all the ports of the French colonies be open to vessels of the United States of America.

ART. II. Provides that the same duties are to be paid on all produce exported or imported in American vessels into or out of the colonies or of France, as are borne by French vessels.

ART. III. Authorizes the executive council to take such measure that states with whom the republic is at war do not reap any benefit from the advantages granted to friendly powers

ART. V. Suspends the law of August 20, 1790, and permits the landing in the ports of the republic vessels laden with merchandise from the East Indies, the Isle of France, and of Bourbon.

The National Convention has suspended the law of the 15th of May, 1791, which inhibited the Americans from introducing, selling, and arming their vessels in France, and from enjoying all the advantages allowed to those built in the ship-yards of the republic.

ARTICLE I. The French ships of war and privateers may arrest and bring into the ports of the Republic the neutral vessels which shall be laden wholly or in part either with articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations and destined for an enemy's port, or with merchandise belonging to an enemy.

ART. II. The merchandise belonging to an enemy shall be declared good prize, and confiscated to the profit of the captors. The articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations, and laden for an enemy's port, shall be paid for according to their value in the place to which they were destined.

ART. III. In all cases, the neutral vessels shall be released as soon as the unloading of the articles of provision arrested or of the merchandise seized shall have been effected. The freight thereof shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the persons who shipped them. A just indemnification shall be allowed in proportion to their detention by the tribunals who are to have cognizance of the validity of the prizes.

ART. IV. Provides for the transmission of inventory of provisions and merchandise seized to ministers of marine and foreign affairs.

ART. V. Provides that this decree shall cease to have effect as soon as the enemy powers shall have declared free and not seizable, although destined for the ports of the Republic, the articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations, and the merchandises laden in neutral vessels and belonging to the Government or citizens of France.

This decree has a preamble in which are cited a number of seizures of French goods in Anglo-American, Danish, Genoese, and vessels of other nations, by the English.

[Decree of the 26th of March, 1793.]

The national convention willing to prevent by precise dispositions the difficulties that might arise relatively to the execution of its decree of the 19th February last concerning the United States of America, to grant new favors to this ally nation and to treat in its commercial relations with the colonies of France in the same manner as the vessels of the Republic:

ART. I. States the tonnage of such American vessels and the character of their cargoes as are to be admitted in the ports of the colonies without duty.

ART. II. States what proportion of coffee and sugar can be laden on vessels.

ART. III. Provides for the transmission of certificate as to gauge of vessel and effective tonnage of cargo.

ART. IV. States what duty and upon what produce it is to be paid.

ART. V. Relates to payment of duties on sugars and coffee.

ART. VI. States that captains of vessels of the United States shall furnish the same bonds required of French vessels if bound for a French port.

ART. VII. Relates to privileges of vessels of the nations with whom the French Republic is not at war.

[Decree of the national convention of May 23, 1793.]

The national convention, after having heard the report of their committee of public safety, wishing to maintain the union established between the French Republic and the United States of America, decree that the vessels of the United States are not comprehended in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May, conformably to the sixteenth article of the treaty concluded on the 6th of February, 1778.

Note subjoined to the foregoing in Waite's State Papers, volume 7, page 149:

It appears that on the 28th May the convention passed a decree which so far repealed that of the 23d May as to place in a state of provisional sequestration the property seized under the decree of the 9th May.

No copy of the decree of the 28th May is to be found in the Department of State.

[Decree of executive directory, July 2, 1796.]

The Executive Directory, considering that if it becomes the faith of the French nation to respect treaties or conventions which secure to the flags of some neutral or friendly powers commercial advantages, the result of which is to be common to the contracting powers, those same advantages, if they should turn to the benefit of our enemies, either through the weakness of our allies or of neutrals, or through fear, through interested views, or through whatever motives, would in fact warrant the execution of the articles in which they were stipulated, decrees as follows: All neutral or allied powers shall without delay be notified that the flag of the French Republic will treat all neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them. The minister of foreign relations is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall not be printed.

[Decree of special agents of the executive directory. To the Windward Islands, Victor Hughes and Le Bas, dated August 1, 1796.]

Considering that laws, as well ancient as modern, forbid neutrals to carry to the enemy contraband or prohibited merchandise; considering that notwithstanding the complaints of the minister of the French Republic, near the United States, of which he has informed us by his letter of the 2d of July, 1796, those States, and especially Virginia, have fitted out vessels loaded with horses for the English, decree that from this day forward all vessels loaded with merchandise, etc, shall be, etc., to be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

The commission resolves that the captains of French national vessels and privateers are authorized to stop and bring into the ports of the colony American vessels bound to English ports, or coming from the said ports. The vessels which are already taken, or shall be hereafter, shall remain in the ports of the colony until it shall be otherwise ordered.

[Decree of the special agents of the French directory. To the Windward Islands, Victor Hughes and Le Bas, dated February 1, 1797.]

Considering that, in virtue of the second article of the treaty of alliance concluded at Paris, on the 6th February, 1778, between the United States and France, the former engaged to defend the American possessions in case of war, and that the Government and the Congress of the United States have strangely abused the forbearance of the Republic of France, in turning to its injury the favors granted to them of trading in all ports of the French colonies; that by permitting neutral vessels any longer to carry provisions of war and of subsistence to men evidently in a state of rebellion, etc., and provides in—

ARTICLE I. The ships of the Republic and the French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into the ports of the Republic neutral vessels destined to the Windward and Leeward Islands, naming the ports.

ART. II. All armed vessels from the ports named shall be deemed pirates and crews punished as such.

ART. III. The vessels and cargoes described in Article I, as well as Article II, declared good prize and to be sold for benefit of captors.

ART. IV. Every captured vessel cleared generally for the "West Indies" to be comprehended under provisions of Articles I and II.

ART. V. The decree of August 1, 1796, made in pursuance of the resolution of the French Directory of July 2, 1796, shall be executed until further orders so far as not contravened by this decree, etc.

[Decree of the Executive Directory, dated March 2, 1797.]

The first three articles give notice that the treaty of 1778 with the United States "has been, from the terms of its second article, in strict right modified by that war entered into in tender on the 19th of November, 1794, between the United States and England (Jay treaty). Consequently, all merchandise loaded under the American flag and not sufficiently proven to be neutral" shall be confiscated.

ART. IV. On ground of eighteenth article of Jay treaty and provisions of twenty-fourth article of treaty of February 6, 1778, increases list of contraband.

ART. V. On ground of twenty-first article of Jay treaty, Americans holding English commissions declared pirates.

ART. VI. Declares that the law of February 14, 1793, the regulations (réglement) of October 21, 1794, and July 26, 1778, as to the manner of proving the right of property in neutral ships and neutral merchandise, shall be executed according to their form and tenor. In consequence, American vessels not having on board a rôle d'équipage in proper form shall be held good prize.

ART. VII. Enjoins on the commissioners of the Executive Directory to call the severity of the tribunals as fraudulent maneuvers of ship-owners calling themselves neutrals.

[Decree of the Executive Directory of July 31, 1798.]

ARTICLE I. Confines to the special agents of the Directory the right of issuing commissions to cruisers, and an injunction especially to observe the law of the 1st October, 1793, which law contains forty-six articles, and relates to the distribution of proceeds of prizes made by French vessels.

ART. II. Declares commissions heretofore granted by the agents in the West Indies to be void thirty days after publication of this decree.

ART. III. Declares that agents and deputies in neutral possessions appointed to decide on questions of validity of prize shall, if they have a direct or indirect interest in the capturing vessel, be recalled.

Commenting on this the Secretary of State says, in his report to Congress:

It is remarkable that this article, apparently designed to correct the monstrous abuse of public officers sitting in judgment in their own causes, should be limited to such of the French agents and their deputies as were appointed to reside in neutral places. I do not know that an instance of the kind exists. For although the French privateers and their prizes find asylums in the Swedish and Danish islands, yet the papers are carried thence to Guadaloupe, and there the captured vessels receive their doom under the superintendence of another special agent of the executive Directory, Victor Hugues; and even the captured American vessels carried into the West India ports of Spain and Holland do not there receive sentence. These cases are decided by the agent or his deputies or other French tribunals established in the Island of St. Domingo, frequently, if not generally, in the absence of the masters and supercargoes.

The French agents and judges find no difficulty in this mode of proceeding, justice being administered with more facility and dispatch when only one of the parties is present at the trial, especially when the agents or other judges are interested in the privateers, and this the present decree impliedly allows; the penalty of "recall" being applicable, as above suggested, to such agents only as reside in neutral places, if any such there be.—Report of Secretary of State, January 18, 1799.

The decree was limited to the West Indies, but as great, if not as numerous, abuses were practiced by French agents and tribunals in Europe, and even in France itself.

"The tribunals of commerce in every port in France take cognizance in the first instance of every matter relative to captures at sea, and these tribunals are chiefly composed of merchants, and most of them are, directly or indirectly, more or less interested in the fitting out of privateers, and therefore are often concerned in the controversies they are to determine upon."—Report Secretary of State, January 18, 1799.

ART. IV. Requires the special agents of the executive directory at Cayenne, St. Domingo, and Gaudaloupe studiously to take care that the interests and property of vessels belonging to neutrals and allies be scrupulously respected.

"We have too long witnessed the studious and scrupulous care of these gentlemen respecting the property of neutrals and allies, and experienced its ruinous consequences; and, as the same laws which authorized that 'care' remain in force, and with a fresh injunction of a strict conformity to them, we can expect only a continuance of the same abuses." (Idem.)

ART. V. Enjoins the arrest and punishment of all who contravene the provisions of the present decree. "Unfortunately these special agents, consuls, and their deputies are themselves the aggressors, and justify their proceedings under the laws of the Republic, and the decrees of the executive directory." (Idem.)

This analysis of the present decree manifests its futility, and with some remarks on its preamble, will demonstrate it to be a bold imposture, intended to mislead the citizens of the United States into a belief that the French Government was going to put an end to the depredations of French cruisers on American commerce, while the means proposed are so gross as to be an insult on our understanding.

[Decree of the Consuls of the Republic of December 19, 1800.]

ARTICLE I. The regulations prescribed by the ordinance of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the navigation of neutral vessels, shall be strictly observed by all those to whom they shall be applicable; but in case of a contravention on their part they are to suffer the confiscations and condemnations, in damages, fixed on by the said ordinance and the laws.

ART. II. Provides for execution of above.

[Decree of special agents of the executive directory of February 1, 1797.]

ART. I. Ships of the Republic and French privateers are authorized to capture and conduct into ports of the Republic neutral vessels destined to Windward and Leeward Island delivered up to the English.

ART. II. Armed vessels from above ports to be treated as pirates.

ART. III. Vessels and cargoes described in Articles I and II are declared good prize.

ART. IV. All vessels cleared out for the West Indies are comprehended in the first and second articles.

ART. V. Decree of the 4th Nivose last to be executed until further orders.

[Decree of the executive directory, March 2, 1797.]

1. French vessels of war and privateers may stop and carry into ports of the Republic neutral vessels which may be found loaded entirely or in part with merchandise belonging to the enemy.
2. Merchandise belonging to the enemy shall be good prize.
3. Neutral vessel shall be released after the merchandise seized has been unloaded, freight paid them, and a just indemnity allowed for detention.
4. Provides for the taking of inventories.
5. That the present law shall cease to have effect when the enemy powers shall declare free and not seizable merchandise loaded on neutral vessels bound for the ports of the Republic, and which shall belong to the French Government or its citizens.

After having heard the minister of justice, of the marine, and of the colonies decrees what follows:

ARTICLE 1. Provides that no judgments shall be founded on the seventh article of the law of 2d January, 1795, unless the minister of justice is previously consulted, as neutrals might pretend to withdraw by means of that law from the execution of that of May 9, 1793.

2. Duty of the minister of justice.
3. States the treaty between the United States and France of February 6, 1778, has been modified by that between the United States and England of November 19, 1794.
4. Adds certain articles to the list of contraband goods.
5. Americans making part of the crew of a public or private vessel of an enemy to be treated as pirates.
6. Provides that the regulations of October 21, 1794, and July 26, 1778, as to the manner of proving the right of property in neutral ships and merchandise shall be executed according to their form and tenor.
7. Provides for the severe attention of tribunals to neutral vessels having double papers.
8. Relative to freights and demurrage.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no purpose to enter upon a discussion of the merits of this proposition. We are confronted with the history of a hundred years of our Government; we are confronted by the vetoes of two Presidents of the United States; we are confronted by the non-action of every Congress but two which has assembled during the present century; and I assume, Mr. Chairman, that even the scholarly and almost classic oration of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] will be insufficient in itself to overturn the action of our Government with regard to these French spoliation claims.

But, I repeat, I have no purpose to enter upon the discussion of the merits of this question. I rise simply to place before the House and the country the status of these claims, and to show if I can the disinclination and the refusal of those who advocate their merits to submit their adjudication to that tribunal which of all others is the proper tribunal for the adjustment of such questions, namely, the Supreme Court of the United States.

The gentleman from Massachusetts assumes two things; first, that these claims are just, and that our Government owes them; and second, that these claims are adjudicated, that some court of competent jurisdiction, with power and authority to render a final judgment which shall be binding upon us, has settled their validity as against the Government of the United States and a debt of honor resting on the American people. The first proposition, as I have already said, I do not intend now to controvert, because I assume that what is true of every other member of Congress is true of the gentleman from Massachusetts, namely, that neither he nor any man who devotes himself to the current public business here can make such examination of a matter of this kind as would justify action upon his own part, much less justify other members following his judgment, in a matter which requires the amount of historical investigation that is essential to arrive at a correct conclusion upon a subject like this.

There is but one way that we may properly and rightfully adjudicate and settle a controversy of this character, and that is by the submission of it to a court which shall have the right to render final judgment; and I repeat again that the court of all others most appropriate for the accomplishment of that purpose is the Supreme Court of the United States. I return now to invite attention to the provisions of the act of 1885, and I read only so much of it as is appropriate to the suggestions which I propose to make upon this subject, viewing it purely from a legal standpoint.

The third section of the act of 1885 provides:

That the court shall examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims included within the description above mentioned, together with their present ownership, and if by assignee, the date of assignment, with the consideration paid therefor: Provided, That in the course of their proceedings they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the same. And they shall decide upon the validity of such claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

The very language of this act, the very terms which it uses when it says that these claims are to be determined according to the rules of "municipal and international law," indicate that the proper tribunal for the determination and settlement of these questions is that court which is our court of last resort for the determination of international questions or questions arising under our own laws.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And our constitutional court.

Mr. ROGERS. And, as my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, our constitutional court. But, Mr. Chairman, I emphasize the last provision of this third section of the act of 1885. What is the Court of Claims required to do? Is it to render judgment in favor of the claimants? Not at all. It is to examine and "report all such conclusions of fact and law as in its judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor." But, out of an abundance of caution, there was a provision inserted in the sixth section of the same act which shows conclusively that it was not the purpose of the Congress when it passed that act to be itself bound by any findings of either fact or law which might be reported to it under the provisions of the act by the Court of Claims.

The last clause of section 6 is in these words:

Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress; and all claims not finally presented to said court within the period of two years limited by this act shall be forever barred; and nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

Under that act these claims have been presented to the Court of Claims. Some of them have been determined by that court in pursuance of this law, and reported to Congress.

It is said (I allude to this only by way of parenthesis) that these claims amount to a much less sum than that which is stated by the Department of Justice. I refer to this only for the purpose of showing the importance of our acting deliberately, wisely, and with proper information when we embark upon the adjustment and settlement of claims of this character. I find on page 4 of the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1887 the following:

The petitions filed in the French spoliation cases number 5,560, representing 2,386 vessels and about $30,000,000. Thirteen cases arising upon four vessels were reported by the court with favorable recommendations to Congress on December 6, 1886.

In a later letter, which I will print with my remarks, the Department of Justice, in response to a communication of my own dated July 4, 1888, expressed the opinion that these claims will reach somewhere in the neighborhood of thirty-odd million dollars, as stated in the official report of the Attorney-General of 1887.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, July 24, 1888.

SIR: In answer to your request for information from this Department upon the subject of French spoliation claims, I have the honor to send herewith a letter from Hon. B. Wilson, assistant attorney, who has charge of the defense of those claims.

Very respectfully,

G. A. JENKS, Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN H. ROGERS,

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, July 24, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following statement, in response to a call made upon this Department by Hon. JOHN H. ROGERS, of the House of Representatives, for information as to the amount involved in French spoliation cases, filed in the Court of Claims under the act of January 20, 1885, and the sum probably to be required if the claims shall be paid on the principles and basis settled by the Court of Claims in cases already tried.

There have been filed in all 5,569 claims (petitions). In 3,609 of that number the amount claimed is $27,081,939.96; average per claim, $7,781.08. In the remaining 1,960 cases this Department has not been informed of the amounts claimed. The original petitions, generally in manuscript, are filed with the clerk of the Court of Claims, and after being printed by claimant copies are sent to this Department. In many cases no such copies have yet been received. It sometimes occurs that the amount claimed is not stated in the original petition. This claimants can correct by further pleading and proof under the rules of the court.

If the above average, in cases where the amounts claimed are stated, shall be extended to those cases in which amounts have not been stated, the total aggregate of all the claims filed would be $42,332,668.52.

The court has reported to Congress favorably to claimants in 106 cases, amounting to $741,606.63; average of allowed claims, $6,996.28$\frac{28}{106}$.

It has also reported in 17 cases adversely to claimants, amounting to $127,046.55, including a few cases dismissed by claimants' attorneys.

It has also decided a small number of other cases adversely to claimants, but has not reported its conclusions to Congress for the reason that motions have been made for rehearing or new trial in them.

106 cases reported favorably as above	$741,606.63
17 cases reported adversely	.....
123 cases	741,606.63

Average of all cases reported to Congress, favorably and adversely, $6,029.32$\frac{27}{123}$.

If this average in the 123 cases already disposed of should apply to the cases yet to be tried it would require $33,577,295.30 to pay them. But it is not probable that this will be so. Experience has shown that the amounts recovered in suits brought in the Court of Claims against the Government under various acts conferring jurisdiction were materially less than the amounts claimed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. WILSON, Assistant Attorney.

Hon. GEORGE A. JENKS,
Acting Attorney-General.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I pass from my first proposition, that the finding of the Court of Claims is not binding or conclusive on Congress, but only advisory both as to law and fact; and I proceed to the second proposition upon which I plant myself, that there is no precedent to be found in the history of civilized governments where any country has undertaken to pay so large a sum as $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 to its own people on a claim based upon international law until the claim has been adjudicated and determined by the highest court known to such country.

The Congress of the United States intrusted the management of these claims in the Court of Claims to the Department of Justice. That Department has given to this matter a consideration which Congress, with the current business imposed upon it, is incapable of giving, and the Attorney-General, acting upon the investigation and conclusions reached by the counsel to whom the preparation and argument of these cases have been intrusted, has embodied in his report to the Congress of the United States a recommendation that the right of appeal should be authorized from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States. In order that this matter may be placed properly before the House, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1887.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the 20th day of January, 1885, Congress passed "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims to American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801" (23 Stats., 283), by which the claims referred to in the title were submitted to the Court of Claims. That court, under the law, is empowered and required, among other subjects, to determine the amount and ownership of the claims, their validity as against France, and, in the event of the legality of the claim as against France being established, then the legal obligation of the United States to pay the amount to the claimant.

The determination of the rights under the provisions of the act are of a judicial character, involving difficult questions of maritime and international law. The amounts dependent upon a proper decision of the principles to be determined are very large; already 5,569 suits have been instituted under the act, in which the amount in controversy reaches many millions of dollars.

In order that the demands of justice may be satisfactorily met, the antiquity of the transactions, the difficulty of the questions involved, and the magnitude of the amounts demanded, suggest the necessity of a vigilant, exhaustive judicial investigation. I therefore recommend the passage of an act amendatory of the act of the 20th of January, 1885, which shall confer authority upon the Court of Claims to render judgment in the cases provided for by the act, instead of reporting their conclusions to Congress as now required to do, and to grant to either party, the Government or claimant, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Court of Claims on suits filed under the act of 1885.

It is not probable that either the Government or claimant will find it necessary to resort to appeals in more than a few cases, as in them the questions of novelty and difficulty arising in this class of cases would be adjudicated; but as the law now stands no appeal can be taken by either party.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, long before this report was made to Congress by the Attorney-General, Hon. J. Randolph Tucker, chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, introduced a bill, which was ordered reported as I now recollect (though about that I am not absolutely sure), granting a right of appeal from these judgments of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the beginning of the present Congress I obtained a copy of that bill, introduced it, and had it referred to the Judiciary Committee of this House. It is the bill upon which a majority of that committee has made an adverse report, having found serious objections in their minds to its terms and provisions. At a later day—perhaps in February of the present year—I introduced another bill, conforming its provisions to the objections which gentlemen of the majority of the committee had urged against the original bill.

The main objection of the majority of the Judiciary Committee to the bill first presented grew out of the provision that—

The Court of Claims is hereby authorized and required, in such cases as the Attorney-General of the United States shall select as best fitted to test the questions of liability of the United States Government for the claims hereinafter referred to, to hear and determine the legal validity of the claims, etc.

This provision, which authorized the Attorney-General, and did not authorize the opposite party, to select the cases on which should be determined the questions of international and maritime law involved, was regarded by the majority of the Judiciary Committee as operating harshly and oppressively upon at least a portion of the claimants.

The bill which the minority of the Judiciary Committee reported back as a substitute for that bill, the minority report being signed by seven members of the committee, one less than a majority of the full committee——

Mr. BUCKALEW. Just one-half of those who acted.

Mr. ROGERS. And, as my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, just one-half of those who acted on the bill—obviates the oppressive feature to which objection was found by making this provision:

Each party shall have the right of appeal from any such judgment to the Supreme Court, according to the laws and rules regulating appeals in that court.

So that every claimant may have the right, if he elects to do so, to appeal from the final judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States to settle his rights. But upon the other side, the Attorney-General of the United States in the exercise of his discretion may select such cases as he may choose, which may have been decided against the Government, and appeal them to the Supreme Court of the United States. So that that provision of this bill which was objected to by them went not to the right of appeal, but to the purpose of the bill; and if they had shown that courage of conviction with reference to the law and the facts of this case which they proclaim here, it was in their power as a majority of the committee to have amended the bill to submit their claims to the constitutional court of the country. But the minority of the committee relieved them of that responsibility by preparing and submitting as a substitute for that bill that which now stands on the Calendar, a bill which embodies that feature and which is now pending before the House for consideration.

But another fault, Mr. Chairman, another objection which they found to the provisions of the bill was the delay incidental to an appeal. I went for the purpose of determining that question for myself to the assistant clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States and made the inquiry of him, that if the right to advance the claims were conferred upon the Supreme Court, and it was made their duty to advance them, how long it would be before the cases in their regular order might be reached and determined after being placed upon the docket of that court. He informed me that in his judgment a case, three or four or five cases, might be easily determined within four or five or six weeks after having been placed upon the docket.

Mr. RAYNER. What authority have you to say that the Supreme Court of the United States will advance them?

Mr. ROGERS. Why, we give them authority and make it their duty to do so.

Mr. RAYNER. But you do not propose to send up three or four cases in advance and let all the rest stand?

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, no; advance all of them that anybody sees fit to appeal.

Mr. OATES. Or only such as the Attorney-General may appeal on behalf of the Government.

Mr. ROGERS. Of course the Attorney-General will determine such cases as he might appeal. If a case is decided against the Goverment, the Attorney-General would exercise his judgment as to whether the United States should appeal or not. But it is admitted that these cases are subject to classification, so that two or three cases would embrace every single solitary question that can be presented to the Supreme Court except the single question of fact. Now, if these cases were advanced in that manner, the Attorney-General of course would take the judgment in a previous case covering one of a class, and that would determine him as to the question of taking an appeal in that particular case, and all others involving the same or similar questions of law.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman if in his judgment Congress can compel the Supreme Court of the United States to advance any cause upon its dockets?

Mr. ROGERS. It does it under its own rules. The Supreme Court never refuses at the suggestion of Congress. It may do it sua sponte. There is no difficulty about that point.

Mr. SENEY. That is the practice of the court.

Mr. ROGERS. So, Mr. Chairman, there is no objection, so far as that is concerned, to the proposition embodied in the views of the minority. We have therefore eliminated from the majority report the two most serious objections, one being the deprivation of the claimant's right of appeal, and the other the objection that these cases would be long delayed, because we advance them upon the docket.

I pause to inquire, why is it that with all the experience of long years, with the accumulated non-action of every Congress that has assembled in one hundred years except two, with the vetoes of two Presidents, with the knowledge of the fact of the absolute impossibility for members of Congress with the current work imposed upon them to investigate for themselves the immense mass of matter involved in the pending questions—why is it, if these claimants really have the courage of their convictions that these claims are just and right, why do they not readily submit to their determination by the Supreme Court of the United States? It would expedite the determination of these cases and secure their liquidation, and forever settle these great questions of maritime and international law, which would be invaluable to us as a people in the event of similar negotiations with other nations in the great future that lies before us. No other determination should be accepted by us as a people.

I say it is impossible for members of Congress to give the question that attention its importance demands, nor is Congress adapted to that character of work. It is true, sir, that by an inadvertence in the preparation of the substitute bill which the minority would offer, they omitted to place in it the authority conferred upon the Supreme Court to advance these causes upon the docket, but in the body of the report they say:

> Besides, the undersigned have proposed to give to a test case or test cases preference and priority of hearing by the court on account of their magnitude and importance, and because the United States will be a party.

So that the opposition to the consideration of these cases by the Supreme Court of the United States rests not upon the indisposition of the court or of the Government to give these parties a day in court, and a speedy day, upon the facts and the law, but it rests upon the fact of the want of confidence in the final judgment of that tribunal. If these people had adopted the views suggested by the Attorney-General their claims might have been settled now by the final judgment of that court; and that judgment would stand here as pillars of adamant upon which their claims might safely rest, with the absolute certainty that they would be speedily paid. Resting on that basis, no one dare, and if he did no one could successfully, assail them.

But if they have no case, then, Mr. Chairman, they deserve that treatment at the hands of Congress which they have received at the hands of the Forty-ninth Congress, and every Congress, namely: A refusal to recognize these as honest debts against the Government of the United States. For one, though confronted when I came into public life with the theory that the policy of the Government, at least by its practice, was to postpone and sometimes to refuse to pay even the final judgments of the last court of resort, I have lived to see that doctrine repudiated and the practice obtain to accept them as absolute verity and as binding upon the conscience of the Government that they shall be paid; and all I ask now, Mr. Chairman, is, that here where we are called upon to take from the Treasury of the United States forty millions or thirty millions, or ten, eight, or six millions of the public money, we shall have a final judgment of the last court of resort, especially in view of the large amount of these claims and the opposing action which has been had upon them from time to time in the past.

Mr. Chairman, I have said about all I care to say in reference to the subject. I desire now, in connection with what I have said, to have the minority report of the Judiciary Committee, expressive of their views upon this question, together with a copy of the bill, printed in connection with the observations which I have just made, and I submit one other observation only. It has come to be a sort of maxim about the Halls of Congress that any claim can pass which is large enough and old enough, provided it is persistently pressed by those who have it in charge. The very integrity of our body; the very decency that should attend the disposition of public business; by every principle of sound government; by every principle that should govern men in their actions in dealing with a question of this kind, concerning which and about which they can not make a thorough investigation, we ought, before we dispose of the money which is the trust fund of the people, to have at least the solemn judgment of the great constitutional court organized for the settlement and determination of great constitutional questions. We ought to have it for our own safety. We ought to have it that we may retain the confidence of the people. We ought to have it because of the great age of these claims and the doubts and discredit resting upon them, both by the affirmative action of two Presidents and the persistent refusal of Congress for a century to recognize or pay them. We ought to have it that it may not be said of the Democratic party in future and with semblance of foundation in truth, as it was said when the people returned us to power, that we are unfit and incapable of dealing with great questions of Government and statecraft. We ought to have it that it may not be said of us truthfully that we have begun the payment of claims that may ultimately reach thirty millions of money without that just, proper, prudent, and wise investigation which is necessary to the arrival at a correct conclusion.

In behalf of honest government, then, in behalf of right action, in behalf of the integrity of our own body, in behalf of its good name, and to avoid even the semblance of doing evil, I ask that we have this matter submitted to that court which ought to try it, and which shall relieve us of any responsibility for its judgment, because it is the great constitutional court to whose decisions all men in this country should cheerfully and readily submit.

The undersigned members of the Judiciary Committee, to whom was referred House bill No. 1990, to amend the act of January 20, 1885, relating to the ascertainment of French spoliation claims, being unable to agree with the majority of the committee, hereby submit to the House of Representatives their views upon the subject of the bill referred to the committee.

The majority of the committee in their written report upon the bill set forth the fact that the bill does not follow the recommendation of the Attorney-General, made in his annual report upon French spoliation claims, but differs from it in essential particulars. The undersigned submit that this fact is no reason for rejecting the bill, but simply supplies an argument for amending it.

The majority also say that conferring jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court to review these claims would produce serious delay, to the injury of the claimants. To this the undersigned answer that the decision by that court of a single case will settle the question of right for all other cases of the same class, and that consequently such other cases will not be litigated in that court. Besides, the undersigned have proposed to give to a test case or test cases preference and priority of hearing by the court on account of their magnitude and importance, and because the United States will be a party. It is, in fact, quite possible that these cases of claims will be sooner disposed of in this way than by continued contest in the Court of Claims and in Congress.

The majority of the committee denies or doubts the power of Congress to confer jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court in the form proposed by the bill, and cites various judicial opinions that the courts have no jurisdiction of political questions not of a judicial nature, and for which an action does not lie. But this is again an objection to the language or form of the bill, which, if well taken, points not to its rejection, but to its amendment. By the Court of Claims and by a majority of this committee, the claims are put expressly upon the ground that, although they do not constitute causes of action under existing laws, they are none the less legal rights against the Government of the United States. They can not be enforced, however, against the Government, because the Government is not liable to suit, unless by its own consent. But it requires no argument to show that the Government may consent to have them adjudicated and make proper provisions of law for that purpose. (United States vs. Arredondo, 6 Peters's Supreme Court Reports, page 691.)

It is the opinion of the undersigned that the question of just liability by the United States to these claimants, considering the important questions which they involve, and the magnitude of the claims, should be submitted to the Supreme Court for disinterested and intelligent judgment. The character of that court, its high intelligence, its independent position qualify it above all other possible tribunals for the examination and decision of the claims. It is the great court established by the Constitution for the determination of questions to which the United States shall be a party, or which involve the construction of treaties or statutes of the United States; and its judgment will have a sanction in the respect and confidence of the claimants, and of the whole people of the United States, which the decision of no other authority can possess. And upon a question of Government liability, so long contested, and requiring profound, conscientious examination and judgment, no less authority should be accepted to finally conclude the parties to the controversy.

These claims involve an examination and construction of treaties with France in the years 1778 and 1788, the proclamations of neutrality by President Washington in 1793, in its relations to those treaties, the Jay treaty with Great Britain, of 1795, and the treaty of amity and peace with France in the year 1800, which terminated all acts of hostility by France and the United States, under authority of their respective Governments, and they also involve questions of public law regarding the nature and effect of several acts of Congress in the years 1798 and 1799, referred to and described by Judge Marshall in Talbot vs. Seaman, 1 Cranch, page 9, and of certain decrees and orders of the French Government and the action of her prize courts for several years prior to the peace treaty, negotiated September 30, in the year 1800.

All these treaties, acts, decrees, and adjudications proceeded from sovereign powers, and their nature and effect, so far as the present claims are concerned, demand examination and judgment by our highest constitutional court. It is true that the acts of Congress above mentioned did undergo interpretation and exposition by the Supreme Court in the case of Bas vs. Tingy, 4th Dallas, page 37, and again by the master hand of Judge Marshall in Talbot vs. Seaman, 1 Cranch, page 9, by which decisions they were held to have established upon our part, the relation of war between us and the French Republic, and to have recognized France as a public enemy, engaged in waging war against us. In the view of the court, and in the language of the American negotiators of the treaty of 1800, it was "a war limited in its extent, but not in its nature," because it was confined to the ocean, and consisted mainly of the very depredations of French cruisers and of retaliation of American vessels, accompanied by the repeal by Congress of the existing treaties with France.

The Court of Claims, however, in their advisory opinions to Congress, under the recent act of 1885, appear to be of a different opinion, applying the laws of peace where the Supreme Court applied the laws of war. In this conflict of opinion it is but fit that the greater court, acting judicially, should pronounce the final opinion. Besides the weighty questions just mentioned there are others which are only secondary to it in importance, which demand review and the highest judicial authority for their settlement; among others, the legal effect of the treaty of 1800, in imposing an alleged liability to the claimants upon this Government. That treaty being wholly silent as to these claims, although they were the subject of prior controversy, we are advised that the French Government was discharged from the claims, and our Government became bound for their payment.

In the final form given to that treaty by our own Government, accepted by France, it is unquestionably true that the further prosecution of the claims was abandoned by us, of which fact two possible explanations are made in the present controversy. The one on behalf of the claimants is, that counter-claims by the French Government were also abandoned at the same time, and that that abandonment constituted the consideration for abandoning ours. The other explanation made on behalf of our Government is, that we desisted from pressing them or renewing them because the obtaining of their allowance was manifestly impossible. We recognized no counter-claim of France founded upon our defensive measures of hostility, and surrendered no claim on behalf of our citizens in consideration of their abandonment.

As to the renewal of our former treaties with France, proposed by the French negotiators in connection with an adjustment of claims for captures on both sides, this was clearly not a counter-claim by the French Government, but a question of public policy, for the free consideration of each party to the negotiation. Those treaties had been broken by France, had been declared abrogated by act of Congress, and had been annulled by actual war. Our Government was under no obligation, legal or moral, to recognize or revive them, nor could a supposed release from their obligation have been a consideration to our Government in making or accepting the treaty of 1800 in the final form given to that treaty by the American Senate. It has therefore been always insisted on behalf of our Government that her duty to her own citizens was fully and faithfully performed, being carried to the extent of actual hostilities for their protection, the repeal of the French treaties to coerce France, and the recovery of the claims pursued with the utmost zeal, vigilance, and determination in the lines of remonstrance and negotiation. It was our utter inability to recover indemnity for our citizens and no lack of zeal or effort on their behalf that caused our Government to abandon the prosecution of the claims.

Beyond question liability on our Government must rest upon the assumption that there was no public war between the two countries involving the capture and confiscation of American vessels, and also upon the further assumption that our Government failed in its duty to prosecute these claims with due fidelity and vigilance against France. But as these assumptions are not true the liability now contended for can not exist.

The undersigned have not overlooked the fact that these claims are now of immense magnitude, as presented under the act of 1885, and that they exceed many times over the amount asked for in the numerous former reports and bills presented to Congress. The claims were formerly limited to $5,000,000 as the maximum of outlay by the Government in case of their allowance, whereas the aggregate of claims now presented in the Court of Claims is represented to exceed $30,000,000, and if the time for presenting them shall be extended many more will be added to the aggregate mass. No judgment of any court has yet sanctioned them, for the act of 1885 only referred them to the Court of Claims for investigation and reports upon them to Congress, reserving to the latter full power to judge them, and approve or disapprove them, or to take such action as the two Houses might think fit. The proposition that they shall now be finally determined by the Supreme Court, by a speedy decision, is a natural sequence or outcome of the long controversy upon the claims, for nothing but the highest judicial judgment can satisfy public opinion or certainly subserve the ends of justice.

The undersigned hereby submit to the House the accompanying bill, which is made a part of their report, as a substitute for the bill reported upon by the majority of the committee, and recommend its adoption by the House, if any recognition of the claims or legislation thereon is to be had by Congress.

I dissent from the action of the committee in reporting adversely the bill providing for an appeal to the Supreme Court from the decisions of the Court of Claims. I am in favor of having the Supreme Court pass upon the question of the liability of the United States to pay these claims. Nothing else will ever satisfy the people of this country on that question. I withhold any further expression of opinion. WM. C. OATES.

[Fiftieth Congress, first session, H. R. 6704.]

A bill to amend the act of the 20th of January, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801," so as to provide for the rendition of judgments by the Court of Claims and for appeals to the Supreme Court.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of the 20th of January, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801," be, and the same is hereby, amended, as follows:

"To authorize and direct the Court of Claims to render judgments in the cases growing out the said claims, instead of reporting to Congress, as now required by the said act," all such conclusions of fact and law as in "their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor." But in any case in which judgment shall be rendered for the claimant it shall be without interest.

"SEC. 2. Each party shall have the right of appeal from any such judgment to the Supreme Court, according to the laws and rules regulating appeals in that court.

"SEC. 3. Judgments may, at the instance of either party, be rendered by the Court of Claims in cases already reported to Congress, with the right of appeal to either party as provided in the above section.

"SEC. 4. That all acts or parts thereof in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. LONG. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. Chairman, I think that it would be a great shame and an outrage upon these claimants to send them to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, let us look at that proposition for a moment before briefly discussing the merits of the case. In the first place, you virtually abrogate the authority conferred on the Court of Claims to give judgment in these cases.

You have to provide that there shall be appellate jurisdiction in the Supreme Court to hear these cases from the Court of Claims as an inferior tribunal under the Constitution. In other words, you abrogate and repeal all the legislation that has been passed in reference to these cases. You cancel and obliterate all that the Court of Claims has done upon these cases, and you have to invest it with a new, a peculiar, and an original jurisdiction, and then invest the Supreme Court of the United States with appellate jurisdiction as to every judgment that the Court of Claims renders.

Why, what an outrage this would be upon those people. My friend from Arkansas asks to have these cases sent to the Supreme Court and acted on. He knows what condition that court is in. He knows that you can get no case advanced on the Supreme Court docket unless there is a criminal question involved—perhaps capital punishment. It will take the Supreme Court years and years to reach these cases. That court is now four years behind on its docket.

It would be fifty years before judicial procedure could be had upon these claims, and another generation will have passed out of existence before the claims which for nearly a century have been urged against our Government shall be adjudicated. I refer my friend from Arkansas to the case of Gordon against the United States; the last opinion, I think, delivered by Chief-Justice Taney, a man of eminent ability whose name illustrates the pages of American history.

What was the decision in that case? What are you giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction over? What is the Supreme Court going to decide? What is the legal question that you propose to submit to the Supreme Court? You can not sue the United States unless the United States consent to be sued, and the moment that such consent to be sued is given there is no necessity for leaving to the Supreme Court the question whether the United States can be sued. Now, what is the next question it is proposed to leave to that court? You propose to leave to it a political question, not a question of law. Has the Supreme Court ever passed upon a question of treaty?

Why, this is a political question. It is not a question of law. Has the Supreme Court of the United States ever passed upon a question of a treaty? Can the learned gentleman point me to a single case substantially similar to this one?

Mr. OATES. I can point you to one in your own State where the Supreme Court passed on a treaty and its effect as against a statute of Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Let us have the case.

Mr. OATES. It is the case of Chirac against Chirac, in one of the old reports which I can furnish you if you desire.

Mr. RAYNER. Undoubtedly; but that was a case between individuals where the treaty came into question collaterally. This is not a case where a treaty is collaterally passed upon. A State court, a justice of the peace, even, can pass upon a treaty under certain circumstances. If in a case between A and B a treaty is involved collaterally, the court can pass upon its effect; but that is not the proposition here. This is a proposition to give the Supreme Court of the United States appellate jurisdiction to construe treaties between this country and France in 1778 and 1800, and standing here upon the principles of international law and upon the principles of constitutional law, I assert that the Supreme Court of the United States has no jurisdiction over a question of international law which is purely a political question, and it has been so determined over and over again by an unbroken and uninterrupted line of decisions of the Supreme Court itself. Here is what Chief-Justice Taney says on that subject:

> Indeed, no principle of constitutional law has been more firmly established or constantly adhered to than the one above stated—> that this court has no jurisdiction in any case where it can not render judgment in the legal sense of the term, and when it depends upon the legislature to carry its opinion into effect.

How can the Supreme Court of the United States render legal judgment against the United States in the determination of a political question affecting a treaty between the United States and France? That is a very good way to get out of the payment of this debt; for let me tell you that if you ever give the Supreme Court the jurisdiction which the minority of this committee claim it ought to have, no man will ever get a dollar that is involved in the cases which we are now discussing.

Now, I leave that proposition and proceed to discuss as rapidly as I can the inherit merits of this case. The fundamental proposition that underlies this controversy, in my opinion, is this: Was there a war? I do not go quite so far as my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] does upon that subject, who says that even if there was a war it would not prevent these claimants from recovering. The question in my opinion is, was there a war between the years 1794 and 1801 between the United States and France? If there was a war, I think that is an end of these claims. If there was no war, then the United States, as trustee for its citizens, was bound to prosecute these claims in the recognized tribunals of the French Government, and if it failed to do so, whether it received any consideration or not, it is responsible to its citizens for all the damages resulting from its default. Now, I say there was no war. I say there was not anything like a war.

I say that any school boy acquainted with the history of that time knows that between 1794 and 1801 there was no war between the United States and France. There was a transient misunderstanding, as Napoleon called it; there was a limited condition of hostilities, as Chief-Justice Chase and Justice Patterson said; but according to the definition of war given by the highest authorities on international law there was no war. What is war? War is a condition of affairs where one nation is authorized to conduct hostilities against the other nation, and where every member of that nation is authorized to conduct hostilities against the other. I refer you to the definition of war given by the very highest authority upon the subject—I am speaking now of perfect war.

A perfect war is where one whole nation is at war with another nation, and all members of both nations are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other in every case and under every circumstance admitted by the laws of war.

That is the definition given by Wheaton, the highest authority that we have to-day upon that subject.

Now, what was the condition of affairs between this country and France? The vessels of the United States, carrying the American flag, were seized upon the high seas and carried into the ports of France because they failed to comply with the municipal regulations of the French Government. What were the municipal regulations of the French Government? A vessel of the United States carrying English goods, a vessel of the United States carrying an English subject, a vessel of the United States not equipped with the proper roll, was carried into the admiralty courts of France and was condemned and confiscated under the local laws of France.

Can the gentleman give me an instance where an American man-of-war seized upon a private merchantman of France? You have the negotiations, you have the treaties, you have the voluminous and complicated correspondence surrounding the transactions of that period. Can you give me a single instance where an American man-of-war seized upon a private merchantman of France? Can you point me to any record of any legislation of Congress which ever declared that there was a war between the United States and France?

Who ever heard of a war where there was no declaration of war? Who ever heard of a war where all the legislation referring to the subject, both at the time and afterwards, spoke of a "contemplated war" only, and never of an actual war? In view of what we read and what we know, we might as well dismiss from our minds the idea that France and the United States were at war between the years 1794 and 1801. Now, if they were not at war, had France a right to seize our merchant vessels on the high seas and carry them to the admiralty courts of France and there condemn them because they violated the municipal regulations of the French Government? I stand upon this proposition, and I do not think that the able lawyers who compose the Judiciary Committee will disagree with me, that the ship of a country carrying the flag of its country carries with it upon the high seas the laws of its country wherever it goes.

I say to you that a vessel of the United States on the high seas, carrying the flag of the United States, carries with it the laws of the United States, and that France had no right to condemn those vessels, no right to capture or confiscate them, no right to execute upon them her judicial process. The condemnation was good as to France, I admit; but it was not good against this Government, and this Government was in duty bound to protect the owners of those vessels. Now, let us see what our Government did.

I say—and I am not afraid to say it, because it is a matter of history, and we can all speak the truth about persons who lived a hundred years ago—I say this Government did not keep its treaty obligations with France, assumed in 1778. No student of the history of that time can come to any other conclusion.

The Government of the United States violated the treaties it had made with France; and those treaties having been broken, France claimed that she was not responsible to this Government for the damages she had inflicted on our merchant marine; and while there was included in the first instance in the treaty of 1800 a section providing for mutual compensation, that section was struck out in the Senate of the United States, and in lieu of it a section was inserted providing that each Government should as against the other release the mutual obligations which might exist between them.

Let us see whether I am right in saying that our Government violated its treaty obligations. Let us look at the history of that time. What did the Government of the United States agree to do? It agreed to protect the French possessions upon the American continent against any government on the earth. That was in the treaty of alliance of 1778. There were two treaties of that date—one was the treaty of alliance, the other the treaty of commerce; they were both concluded on the same day. I am speaking now of the treaty of alliance. This Government agreed to protect the French possessions upon the American continent. What in fact occurred? Within a month after the war broke out between England and France, France had lost every colony or possession that she had upon the American continent. She lost the West Indies; she lost all the islands of which she had had possession. So that this Government flagrantly violated that particular stipulation of the treaty.

What else did this Government agree to do? It agreed to give to France exclusive port privileges in this country; that was a part of the treaty. I am not criticizing now the statesmen and patriots of that day; but we know there were some pretty sharp fellows among them. After the United States concluded the treaty with France what did we do? Four years afterward we made a treaty with England which gave to that country the exclusive port privileges that we had before granted to France. I am now speaking of the Jay treaty. The Government of the United States deprived itself of the power to observe the treaty with France by giving to England the port privileges which had already been granted to France in the treaty of 1778.

What did France say? The French Government said: "We have a claim against you; you have violated your treaty with us; we helped you to achieve your independence; we furnished you not only financial aid and all the necessary resources for carrying on your war, but we gave to you the best of our blood, the noblest of our chivalry. You upon your part agreed that if war should arise between France and England you would stand with us against the British Government. You failed to do it; you stood by and saw us deprived of our colonial possessions on the American continent; you violated a solemn treaty by giving to the English Government the very privileges which you had granted to us in the treaty of 1778. Now, we will set off these two claims one against the other." Was there such a set off? Can there be any doubt about that? Let me read one line which I think settles this whole business, if we want to be honest in this matter. Of course if we do not want to be honest, it makes no difference about treaties or anything else. Here at the end of the treaty is this language:

Provided that by this retrenchment the two states—

That is, France and the United States—renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article.

On the 31st of July, 1801, Napoleon consented to accept, ratify, and confirm the convention provided this clause was put in the treaty, and it was put in. Now, do you mean to tell me that the United States can for what was then considered a full and adequate consideration bargain away the rights of its injured citizens and then refuse to take the slightest steps to repay them for the rights thus unlawfully bargained away?

What sort of a principle would that be as between individuals? Why, the United States did not have this claim against the Government of France. It is a claim of the citizens of the United States and was not a claim of the Government; but, I repeat, a claim of our own citizens, and the Government was bound under every principle of right and of international law to go into the tribunals of France and to the very best of its ability protect the rights of its own citizens to recover their property of which they had been wrongfully deprived by the French Government. Having failed to do that the Government assumed, necessarily, the liability itself.

Now, let me finish with a word further. There has been something said of France not having admitted these claims in the minority report—which is an admirably gotten up paper—but it just looks as if it were drawn upon technical grounds with a tremendous effort to defeat the honest claimants of what is their just due. They say that France did not admit them. Suppose France did not admit them, what then? But, as a matter of fact, France did admit them and recognized them all through the treaties, and I think there can be no question of that.

Here is what the French minister wrote in 1794:

If any of your merchants suffer injury by the conduct of our privateers, * * * they may with confidence address themselves to the French Government.

France always recognized them; but, as a matter of fact, whether the French Government recognized them or not is an absolutely immaterial question, because the United States was bound as a trustee for its own citizens, as the guardian of their property, to prosecute the rights of its citizens in the courts of France with all the vigor that was necessary to sustain them. It failed, however, to do so. The Government took no steps to recover for the losses sustained by our citizens, but on the contrary entered into a solemn compact with France renouncing all claims for injuries done to our merchants and their vessels. What position does that place the Government in? What would you do if you were a trustee and acted under such circumstances?

Suppose my brother from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] was a trustee and went to work and made a bargain on behalf of his ward who had a claim against somebody, made a bargain to give up the claim, renouncing it without making an effort to secure it, is he not responsible? Would he not place himself under the same obligation to his ward that the party who owed the claim held? Has the trustee a right to do that? Has the Government the right to do what individuals have not the right to do? Do you propose to apply a different principle to the Government than that which you would apply to individuals?

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a very nice legal proposition contained in the minority report upon this subject—that these people are not allowed to recover the full sum of damages done, but only a part; that they can only recover what France was willing to give them, a lower sum than they had claimed; that they have only the right to recover in the Court of Claims what France was willing to allow, because, say the learned lawyers of the Judiciary Committee, when a man sues for a piece of property he can only recover the value of the property, and they can get from the United States Government only what the United States Government got from France; and they can not get from France except what France was willing to give, and they can not get from the United States Government more than France was willing to give to our Government. Now, that is a beautiful proposition, but that is the substance of it as embodied in the minority report.

I say that every man who lost a vessel on the high seas, every individual whose property was destroyed, is entitled to the full value of the property; and the question as to whether France was willing to yield the whole amount or what France is willing to give has nothing whatever to do with it, because France could have been compelled to pay the whole sum if our Government had proceeded as it should have proceeded, to prosecute the claims before the French tribunals, and which it failed to do.

This has been before the Court of Claims already and their decisions have been rendered. You may take the Supreme Court and the able judiciary of the country as far as you please, and as far as my professional experience goes I have not read a clearer, more able opinion than that delivered by the Court of Claims in this case, and I do not think that you will find the Supreme Court of the United States, with all of its judicial ability, can pass upon these claims with more learning, more ability and accuracy of reasoning than appears in this decision of the Court of Claims.

They have gone over the whole question from beginning to end. They have with the minutest care examined every circumstance connected with the claims, have gone into the whole question presented, have passed upon all the facts, have had the suggestions of the ablest counsel upon the cases, and have decided the question for the second time, and without depending on any legislation upon the part of Congress you propose now to annul everything that they have done, institute a new tribunal, invested with new jurisdiction, and give the Supreme Court of the United States absolute jurisdiction in a political case, and it will be decided in about two hundred and fifty years after all the people are dead who have any interest in the claims.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to all the miserable policy which seeks further delay in a matter of justice of this kind. I will stand here as long as the gentleman from Arkansas will, protesting with all my zeal against the payment of unfounded and spurious debts; but I do most solemnly protest against the stinted economy which keeps poverty from generation to generation eternally knocking and thundering at the gates of chancery and justice for what is equitably due it upon the highest principles of national honor and national faith. [Applause.]

Mr. LONG. I now yield eighteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY was recognized.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman to suspend until I can move that the committee rise temporarily, in order that I may move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the general deficiency appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BURNES. I move that when the House adjourn to-night, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object.

The question was put; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 9.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES].

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it is very evident that there is no quorum here, and that the motion to adjourn should be withdrawn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We have very important appropriation bills before this House that have not been disposed of. I think we should meet and take them up and dispose of them.

Mr. MCMILLIN. They can not be disposed of to-morrow; and we have ample time to make disposition of them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] will withdraw the motion to adjourn over. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] yielded the floor in good faith, in order that this motion might be made, and I hope the House will now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and give him the floor again.

Mr. BURNES. I withdraw the motion to adjourn over, and move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, and on the pending question the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is entitled to eighteen minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at this attempt to defeat an appropriation to pay such of the French spoliation claims as have been adjudicated by the Court of Claims and found to be valid claims against the United States. I need not recapitulate the interesting facts, so closely interwoven with our successful struggle for independence, on which these claims are based. These have been presented in a clear and convincing manner by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG].

Suffice it to say that by our treaties of "alliance" and of "amity and commerce" with France in 1778, we obtained on the one hand the valuable assistance of France which enabled us to secure our independence, and on the other hand engaged on our part to give certain preferences to France and guaranty her possessions in America. After the revolution of 1793-'4 nearly all Europe conspired to crush the French Republic, and France called upon us to perform our part of the treaty of 1778. We found ourselves unable to do so in our weakness, although it was with difficulty that our people could be restrained from giving aid to a nation which had befriended us in our years of trial.

In the progress of the gigantic contest between France and the allied powers, each undertook to cripple the other by prohibiting neutral vessels carrying the commerce of the other from entering each other's ports. In the furtherance of this policy—a policy conceded to be in violation of international law—between 1794 and 1800 French cruisers seized, and French courts confiscated, a large number of American vessels with their cargoes, which seizures and confiscations of American property have been popularly described as "French spoliations," for whose payment in part this bill provides.

While these spoliations were going on, the American citizens, whose property was being ruthlessly appropriated by authority of the French Government, applied to our Government for redress. President Washington, Mr. Jefferson, and United States Minister Pinckney all agreed that the spoliations were in violation of international law, and that it was the duty of the United States to obtain redress. Our minister at Paris demanded payment.

Negotiations opened between the United States and France, the latter unsuccessfully setting up the claim that the seizures were to enforce French laws, or in a state of war; but presenting in offset the French claim for guaranty and preference under the treaty of 1778. The differences were finally adjusted by the convention of 1800 and the treaty of 1801, by which each country renounced its "pretensions," i. e., the claims of the United States for spoliations of her vessels and commerce were offset by an abandonment on the part of France of her claims of guaranty and preference against the United States under the treaty of 1778.

By the treaty of 1801 the United States, for a valuable consideration, relieved France from whatever obligations she was under to pay American citizens for spoliations of their property, and in doing so she equitably assumed such obligations on the part of our Government.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] has given a detailed account of the proceedings in Congress in response to the petitions of those American citizens whose property had been despoiled by France for reimbursement—how bills for this purpose repeatedly passed one or the other branch of Congress, and how finally, when they twice passed both branches in the same Congress, they were vetoed. Forty favorable reports have been made on these claims—one by John Holmes, three by Edward Everett, three by Edward Livingston, one by Daniel Webster, three by Caleb Cushing, three by Rufus Choate, four by Truman Smith, one by Hannibal Hamlin, and three by Charles Sumner. No unfavorable report has been made by any committee to whom these claims were referred for investigation since the publication of the correspondence in 1826.

After so long a delay by the Government in responding to its obligations, Congress by the act of January 20, 1885, referred such of these claims as should be presented within two years to the Court of Claims, directing that court—

> To examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims, * * * together with their present ownership, and if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor: Provided, That * * * they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of law and fact as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor: * * * Provided, That nothing in this act shall be constued as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

After a long and exhaustive hearing, in which the United States was represented by able counsel, the Court of Claims on the 17th of May, 1886, unanimously decided, first, that the claims of our citizens for depredations on their vessels and cargoes between 1794 and 1800 "were good by the law of nations" against France; and, second, that the United States released France from her obligations to pay for such depredations for a valuable consideration, and assumed these obligations for themselves. (Opinion Court of Claims on French spoliation claims, House Miscellaneous Document No. 6, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.)

Since rendering that opinion, the Court of Claims has decided the principles to be applied to the reimbursement for French spoliations, and on this basis has rejected certain claims and adjudicated others, and reported the adjudicated cases to Congress for payment, which cases, by direction of the House of Representatives by resolution adopted in December last, have been included in the pending deficiency bill.

Having reached the point of payment, having passed the ordeal of the court to which the claims were referred by Congress, appropriations having been included in the deficiency bill to pay these claims by vote of the House, certain members of the Committee on Appropriations have come in here with a lengthy paper, objecting to payment on the following grounds:

First. That the amount of these claims will reach $30,000,000.

Even if this were so it would afford no reason for refusal to pay them if the claims are just, especially as the claimants are not to receive interest. But this amount is a gross exaggeration. The original estimate was $20,000,000 for all spoliations; but $7,323,619 of these estimated losses were paid under the convention of 1803 and the treaty of 1819 with Spain, leaving but $12,676,380 remaining, even if all the claims should be paid. But already under the decisions made many of these claims have been rejected by the Court of Claims. The evidence necessary to sustain other claims has been lost. The guess that the whole amount of claims will reach $30,000,000 is based on claims filed. But many of these are duplicates; others are guesses of persons who have filed claims at random; and still others are unfounded. The highest estimate of gentlemen who have investigated the facts is $10,000,000, and the better-founded estimate, $7,000,000.

Second. That France never acknowledged her liability for the depredations; and that the United States did not assume liability for them. It is true that France did not in specifications acknowledge her liability, contending that she was enforcing her own laws or that there was a state of war which justified the seizures. But this position was successfully controverted by the representatives of the United States—so successfully that France canceled the valuable engagements which the United States had made in her behalf in order to get rid of these claims. And the United States having released France from the obligations as respects these claims, by the act of release assumed in equity the liabilities of France. Moreover, for precisely similar depredations subsequently our Government demanded and obtained reparation of France and Spain, and paid to the American citizens whose property had been despoiled the amount obtained.

Third. That as the claimants are not entitled to recover from the United States more than they would probably have recovered from France; and that there is reason to believe France would have paid nothing, or, at most, that $5,000,000 would be a liberal payment.

It is sufficient to say in reply that the United States insisted that France should pay every dollar of the damages to the claimants, and that our Government had no right to surrender them except for what it deemed full compensation. Certainly the release which we obtained from our obligations under the treaty of 1778, as a set-off for these claims, was worth many times even thirty millions. Even if five millions would have been sufficient compensation in 1800, certainly even the largest sum mentioned would not pay that sum and the accrued interest.

Moreover, the objections to the payment of these claims presented by the members of the committee have been decided against their views and in favor of the claimants by the United States court to which the claims were referred by Congress for a decision "upon their validity according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States;" and while it is true that Congress is not so bound by the decision of the court that it is obliged to make appropriations to pay the claims thus referred to the court, yet, in honor and justice, with due regard to its prior action, it is bound to carry out in good faith the decision of its own tribunal, to whom it deliberately referred claims for the adjudication of their validity and justice.

When it is borne in mind that ninety years have elapsed since the depredations were committed on the property of citizens of the United States, on which these claims are based; that our Government steadily maintained the justice of the claims of these citizens on France; that the United States waived further insistence on these claims for a valuable national consideration received from France; that even after the lapse of so long a time during which the American sufferers and their descendants have been denied reparation, they only ask that the original loss shall be paid without interest; and that the court to which Congress referred these claims for determination of their validity has decided that they ought to be paid, it can hardly be possible that Congress will longer refuse to discharge its obligations to its own citizens.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10936) making appropriations for deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-night it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am informed that the Senate has adjourned over till Monday, and that therefore the conferees on the part of the Senate can not be appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army bill. I therefore withdraw my opposition to adjourning until Monday.

The motion of Mr. BURNES was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

POSTAL CRIMES.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair will lay before the House a resolution from the Senate, which seems to be of such importance that it should be disposed of at once.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, August 3, 1888.

Resolved (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the Senate an enrolled bill of the Senate (S. 3303) amendatory of an act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, approved June 18, 1888.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolution will be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (H. R. 8285) to remove the political disabilities of Elliott Johnston;

A bill (S. 1082) to authorize the issuance of patent to certain land in Arkansas; and

A bill (S. 907) to provide for the erection of a public building at Charlotte, N. C.

WILLIAM ENGLISH.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, reported back favorably, from the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. 3721) authorizing the President to appoint William English in the regular Army, United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FROM THE CHARGE OF DESERTION.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 5, 10, 13, 14, and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, and 12, and agree to the same.

C. A. BOUTELLE,
GEO. D. WISE,
H. A. HERBERT,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. D. CAMERON,
WM. E. CHANDLER,
GEORGE GRAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House submitted the following statement:

Statement on the part of the House conference report on bill H. R. 1508.

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) "to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended on the Senate amendments as compared with the bill as it passed the House:

The Senate recedes from its amendments numbered 3, 5, 10, 13, 14, and 15. Numbers 3, 10, and 13 inserted the words "in the volunteer service," from which the Senate receded on the ground that no distinction of regular and volunteer service was made in enlistments for the Navy and Marine Corps during the late war. Numbers 5, 14, and 15 were verbal modifications from which the Senate receded.

Amendments numbered 1 and 11, strike out the words "pay or muster," and amendments numbered 2, 6, 8, 9, and 12 insert the words "and records," to which the House managers recommend agreement; so that the text will read, "in the rolls and records of the Navy or Marine Corps."

Amendment numbered 4, strikes out the word "shall" and inserts the words "may in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy," so that the Secretary may be empowered to refuse to remove the charge of desertion in any case where the evidence shall manifestly fail to justify such relief. The House managers recommend concurrence.

Amendment numbered 7, inserts the words "having previously served six months or more," which conforms to the terms of the bill relating to desertions from the Army, and the House managers recommend concurrence.

C. A. BOUTELLE,
H. A. HERBERT,
GEO. D. WISE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the report of the committee of conference be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BOUTELLE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the cases of H. H. Haskell and G. W. Stevens.

STATUE OF GENERAL LOGAN.

Mr. STAHLNECKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Library, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 155) authorizing the erection of a statue to the late Maj. Gen. John A. Logan by the Society of the Army of the Tennessee and the Grand Army of the Republic, in Iowa Circle, Washington, D. C., and donating condemned guns therefor, and making an appropriation for the pedestal of said statue; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The House then, on motion of Mr. MCMILLIN (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes), took a recess until 8 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 p. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 3, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills under the special order.

GUSTAVUS W. SMITH.

Mr. HATCH. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10006) for the removal of the political disabilities of Gustavus W. Smith, and that the bill be now put upon its passage. I would not ask this courtesy at this time but for the fact that I am unable to remain during the session this evening.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the legal and political disabilities imposed by the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the late rebellion, be, and they are hereby, removed from Gustavus W. Smith, now a resident of the State of New York.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The motion of Mr. CHIPMAN was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that we commence on the Calendar where we left off last Friday evening and follow the same order as at the last session—that is, that the titles of the bills be read in their order, and when the title of a bill is read if no gentleman asks for its consideration that the bill be passed over, with the understanding that any gentleman present shall have leave to call up any bill on the Calendar previously passed over.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

MRS. MAGGIE A. WEED.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2579) granting a pension to Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Egan.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Egan, a volunteer nurse in the late war, at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2579) granting a pension to Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Egan, report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is herewith adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Senate Report No. 988, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

This bill proposes to pension Mrs. Maggie A. Weed, formerly Miss Maggie A. Egan, a volunteer nurse in the late war, at the rate of $12 per month.

Miss Egan was one of that noble band of women who left their homes and loved ones to minister to the sick and wounded soldiers of the Army of the Union. That she was faithful and untiring in the discharge of her voluntarily assumed duties, we append the following statements, the originals of which accompany the papers in the case:

PADUCAH, KY., May 31, 1864.

Miss M. A. Egan has very successfully performed the duties of nurse in the United States general hospital at Paducah for over a year and a half past, having been in the one under my care the major part of that time. She has been attentive and interested, faithful and untiring in her labors; and by her cheerfulness and kindness helped to lighten the load of weariness and suffering of many a poor soldier. I trust she will continue in well-doing, knowing that a life of kindness and disinterested efforts to lighten the miseries of the unfortunate brings with it a glorious reward.

H. HARD,
Acting Assistant Surgeon, U. S. Army.

OFFICE JOE HOLT UNITED STATES ARMY GENERAL HOSPITAL, Jeffersonville, Ind.

Mrs. LIVERMORE,
Secretary C. S. Com.:

I would respectfully request that you send Miss M. A. Egan to report to this hospital as nurse to assist in the linen-room. She was formerly at Paducah, Ky., and with Mrs. Hamilton and Mrs. Hight. As the services of another are needed, Mrs. H. desired that I ask for her.

Very respectfully,

H. P. STEARNS,
Surgeon, U. S. V., in charge.

Your committee feel that this case is a very meritorious one, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID H. LUTMAN.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I call up the bill (S. 2206) granting a pension to David H. Lutman, which has been passed over.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the penson-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David H. Lutman, late a private in Company F, Second Maryland Regiment.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2206) granting a pension to David H. Lutman, submit the following report:

The committee have considered this case, and adopt the report of the Senate as their report, and recommend that said bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 625, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2206) granting a pension to David H. Lutman, have carefully examined the same, and report:

David H. Lutman enlisted as a private in Company F, Second Maryland Regiment, September 6, 1861; discharged September 30, 1864, by reason of the expiration of his term of enlistment; filed his declaration for a pension February 13, 1880; granted a pension for one-half disability in 1885; applied for an increase, his claim was rejected, and he was dropped from the pension-rolls April 22, 1886.

The evidence accompanying the papers show that the claimant was a strong, healthy man when he enlisted in 1861. That in a forced march of his regiment from New Creek to Romney, in December, 1861, just after his return to the Army from the hospital at Cumberland, where he had been ill with the measles, he was compelled to wade several streams, the water at that time being extremely cold, which exposure led to his being sent back to the hospital. When he returned to the regiment he was still suffering from the effects of the disease, and continued to be so affected up to the date of his discharge, it being necessary during that entire period, by reason of his physical condition, to assign him to light duty. The evidence further shows that he has been treated from the date of his discharge to the present time by four or five physicians. His neighbors and comrades who knew him before, during, and after the war, testify to the effects of this exposure and the disability which followed it. He was granted a pension for "spinal irritation, result of measles."

When examined for an increase of pension he was certified as not entitled to any rating. He charges, in an affidavit filed November 17, 1887, that the surgeon who examined him was in a "state of intoxication and entirely unfit to make the examination," and at the same time filed a letter from his family physician sustaining his right, by reason of his disease, to a pension. He had, however, prior to this date been examined by a board at Hagerstown, and the Pension Bureau therefore refused to reopen the case on the ground—

"That the unsworn statement of Dr. Greene is not sufficient to controvert the adverse findings of two boards, and therefore does not warrant an examination looking to restoration. If the claimant wishes restoration he must furnish good and sufficient sworn testimony, medical preferred, showing as a fact, and from personal knowledge of the affiant, that pensionable disability, due to formerly pensioned cause, has existed since the date of dropping, and this testimony should intelligently state how the claimant is affected, and what his condition is, irrespective of the claimant's say-so to neighbors or doctors."

Acting under these instructions the claimant filed the following sworn statement of Dr. E. B. Pendleton, one of the most intelligent and able physicians of that section of the country, and a gentleman of the highest character, who states:

"I have on this 4th day of February, 1888, made a careful examination of David H. Lutman, late a private in Company F, Second Regiment Maryland Volunteers, and find that he is suffering from spinal irritation which incapacitates him from the performance of the manual labor upon which he is dependent for a livelihood."

Second. The affidavit of Dr. C. S. Greene, his family physician, who had been fully vouched for by replies to several confidential inquiries from the Pension Office. His statement is as follows:

"I have, this 4th day of February, 1888, examined D. H. Lutman, late a private in Company F, Second Regiment Maryland Volunteers, and find him suffering from an irritation of the spine, caused (as he informs me) from having taken cold on the measles while in the Army, and said spinal irritation prevents him from performing manual labor to any very great extent, and at times is unable to work at all. I have known said D. H. Lutman for fifteen years, and have been consulted by him in regard to his back on a number of occasions."

Third. The affidavit of William R. Jackson, as follows:

"That he has been personally acquainted with David H. Lutman, who is an applicant for reinstatement on the pension-rolls, for the last twenty years, and during said time said Lutman has been a sufferer from disease said to have been contracted in the Army during the war, and that he further knows that the said Lutman has been in a great measure incapacitated from performing any kind of manual labor, and that he is at this time incapacitated from performing anything like the labor of a full hand. I have worked with said Lutman and know that he can not perform a half day's work regularly, and at many times is not able to work at all for weeks."

Fourth. The affidavit of Henry H. Michael, as follows:

"That he is a resident of Morgan County, West Virginia, and a farmer by occupation; that he is personally acquainted with David H. Lutman, late private in Company F, Second Regiment Maryland Volunteers, who is an applicant for reinstatement on the United States pension-rolls; that the said David H. Lutman is now, and has been for years, suffering from, as I firmly believe, the effects of disease contracted in the line of duty in the Army. I further testify that the said Lutman is not now, nor has he been for a number of years, able to perform more than half of the work of an ordinary hand, and frequently is not able to work at all."

These last two are also credible witnesses.

After these affidavits were filed the Pension Office refused to order the claimant before a board for examination, although he proposed to go to the expense of coming to Washington to be examined, if required by the Department. The Pension Office held "that the medical and lay evidence recently presented does not warrant another examination looking to restoration, as it fails to describe the claimant's physical condition or to show that a ratable disability has existed from the alleged 'spinal irritation' since March 4, 1886."

Do the facts set out in these affidavits warrant this conclusion? We think not, and for the following reasons: The claimant was pensioned in 1885 for "spinal irritation, result of measles," to date from 1864.

Dr. Pendleton makes oath that on the 4th of February, after a most careful examination of the claimant, he finds him suffering from spinal irritation which incapacitates him from the performance of manual labor, a "ratable disability" that had under the decision of the Bureau existed from 1864 to April, 1886. Dr. Greene, his family physician, testifies to the same physical condition of the claimant, and that he had attended him for fifteen years for said disability.

Jackson and Michael, neighbors of the claimant, testify that he has been in a great measure incapacitated from performing any kind of manual labor, and that he is at this time incapacitated from performing anything like the labor of a full hand; the statement of Michael being "that claimant is now, and has been for years, suffering from disease contracted in the line of duty; that he is not now, nor has he been for a number of years, able to perform one-half of the work of an ordinary man, and frequently is not able to work at all."

In the judgment of the committee, these affidavits from physicians of high standing and laymen of credibility cover every point suggested by the medical department of the Pension Office. It is not evidence of the "say-so" of the claimant, but is the affirmative, personal knowledge of those who have spoken.

The committee is of opinion that under these affidavits a pensionable disability has been shown, and that the claimant is entitled to be reinstated on the pension rolls as a pensioner in accordance with the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Senate bill 2206 is reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I object.

The question was taken on ordering the bill to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass; and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, no 1.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

The tellers took their places, and the count began.

Mr. CARLTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CARLTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. CARLTON. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A vote is now being taken. The Chair will entertain the gentleman's motion later.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky (before the completion of the count). Mr. Chairman, I have but one reason for objecting to the consideration of bills to-night, and if the committee will listen to my explanation I believe they will agree that I am justified. I think I have worked as hard as any man in this House for the accomplishment of legislation, and there are a number of bills upon the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on War Claims for the benefit of Federal soldiers who are in just as needy circumstances as any Federal soldier who has a pension bill pending here to-night.

The Committee on War Claims had a night assigned to them two weeks ago for the purpose of considering bills of that character, and the House met and certain gentlemen here saw fit to pursue a course which rendered the session worthless to the committee. Later, when I had it in my power to prevent a gentleman who was active on that occasion from getting legislation which he felt to be of very great importance to him, I was urged to withdraw my objection in order that he might pass his bill, and I did so upon the assurance that the Committee on War Claims should have another evening.

Three separate times we have made a request for that recognition, and as often it has been objected to. I have been told that it is in the interest of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that the Committee on War Claims has been pushed aside, and that is the reason for my course here to-night.

That is my only reason; but I find that gentlemen are disposed to take what I do in this matter as personal, although I am always expected to yield and not to feel that it is personal to me when objections are raised to the requests of my committee. I do not think it is fair treatment, but at the request of gentlemen who have appealed to me since I made the point of no quorum, I am going to withdraw it and let business proceed this evening, with the understanding that during the coming week I shall have the co-operation of those gentlemen in having an evening assigned to the Committee on War Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is withdrawn. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ALBERT WATSON.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up a bill which has been heretofore passed over, the bill (H. R. 2894) for the relief of Albert Watson.

Mr. LAWLER. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman [Mr. CANNON] has a right, under the order, to call up this bill, it having been passed over.

Mr. LAWLER. But I object to the consideration of it, and I want to state why I object.

A MEMBER. I object to any more statements.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman [Mr. LAWLER] can not object to the bill at this time, but his objection can be made later.

Mr. LAWLER. I understood at the last evening session that objections were held to be good when a bill was about being presented for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. That was under a special order, but this is under a different order. Of course the gentleman can make his objection effective later.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague has a bill that he desires to have considered, I shall not object.

Mr. LAWLER. I have been here for nine evening sessions and have not got a bill through, and I think it is about time to get recognition for a single bill.

Mr. COOPER. I am in the same box.

Mr. LAWLER. You join with me, then, and we will get recognition.

Mr. FUNSTON. This is the first time I have seen the gentleman [Mr. LAWLER] at these evening sessions this summer. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] calls up is one that has been passed over, and under the rule he has a right to call it up.

Mr. LAWLER. Why did not my colleague call up this bill when it was reached?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to answer that question.

Mr. CANNON. I can answer, if it is in order.

Several MEMBERS. "Regular order!"

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Albert Watson, the invalid son of Peter D. Watson, late a private of Company B, Seventy-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pay said son a pension of $18 per month for and during his natural life.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9824) for the relief of Albert Watson, have examined the papers filed in the case and submit the following report:

Claimant is the invalid son of Peter D. Watson, who was a member of Company B, Seventy-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and a pensioner under certificate No. 172575. He died on November 7, 1884, leaving a widow and the claimant, the only living child. The widow drew a pension by reason of the death of said soldier and she again remarried about October 1, 1885.

The claimant is a deformed cripple, and has been so since childhood; has spinal affection; is hump-backed; has curvature of breast; face deformed; is very weak, and can hardly go about without assistance; is totally unable to do any kind of manual labor; has no income, and is dependent upon charity for support; his age is nineteen.

There are numerous affidavits substantiating the above statement as to his condition, and your committee are convinced that this is one of the cases that call for the generous action of Congress. We therefore report the bill favorably, and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM COLLINSWORTH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call up the bill (S. 1122) granting an increase of pension to William Collinsworth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Collinsworth, late a private in Company G, One hundred and eleventh Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $24 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 1122, beg leave to report that they have considered said case and adopt the report of the Senate as their report, and recommend that said bill do pass.

[Senate Report No. 667, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1122) granting an increase of pension to William Collinsworth, have examined the same, and report:

Claimant is now pensioned at the rate of $6 per month on account of gunshot wound of right leg. Claim for increase of pension on account of injury of left hip, side, shoulder, and testicle was rejected January 12, 1886, on the ground that the records of the War Department did not show the existence of said disabilities in the service; that no evidence was on file showing treatment for said disabilities, and that the claimant had declared his inability to furnish satisfactory evidence to establish the claim.

The records of the War Department show that claimant was enrolled August 16, 1862, in Company G, One hundred and eleventh Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged June 6, 1865; that he was admitted to regimental hospital November 17, 1863, with acute diarrhea; was admitted to general field hospital, Fifteenth Army Corps, Marietta, Ga., August 15, 1864, with pleuropneumonia.

In his application for increase of pension, filed October 2, 1871, claimant states that his disabilities are such that he believes himself entitled to a higher rating on account of a fracture of his right leg below the knee. In his declaration filed January 28, 1882, claimant asks for an increase of pension on account of his original disability and additional pension on account of injury extending across the small of back and left shoulder.

In declaration filed June 20, 1884, claimant states that he believes himself to be entitled to an increase of pension on account of increase of disability for which he is already pensioned, as well as an injury received at the same date on the left side, and shoulder, and testicle, caused by a limb falling and striking him; said limb was cut from a tree by a cannon-ball at the battle of Resaca, Ga., May 14, 1863; that the disability for which he is already pensioned was received at the same time and under the same circumstances; that his left testicle is enlarged to almost four times its normal size.

In a letter filed July 7, 1885, claimant states that for good reasons, which he will give, he believes that he is unable to furnish testimony of his regimental surgeon; that he was wounded about 7 o'clock in the evening, and that it was about midnight before he was carried to the surgeon, who was attending fifteen or twenty other wounded men; that the surgeon briefly examined him, remarking that there was no broken bone, and advised him to wait as patiently as possible, as there were other men whose wounds were more severe than his own; that the surgeon came to him again about daylight, and while dressing his wound received an order to follow the regiment immediately; that he was placed in an ambulance and taken to the field hospital, where he was treated by an unknown man; that he was afterward sent to convalescent camp, where he was so cruelly treated that he begged to be allowed to follow his regiment, which request was granted by the surgeon in charge; that owing to his disabilities he was detailed to drive a wagon.

In a letter to Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, under date of December 21, 1886, claimant states that he gave three boys to the service, all of whom are now dead, and that he is now old and crippled from the effects of disabilities received in the service; has a family of dependent girls, with no means of support save the small pittance of $6 per month allowed by the Government; that he sends the affidavits of two comrades, showing that his disabilities were incurred in the service.

Ira A. Maddox, a comrade, testifies that claimant was wounded at the battle of Resaca, Ga., May 15, 1864, by a limb striking him in the left side, right leg, and left testicle; that two ribs of the left side were broken, and claimant was disabled for duty during the remainder of the service.

George W. Birge, a comrade, testifies that while claimant was engaged with the enemy, under General Joseph E. Johnston, on or about May 15 or 16, 1864, at Resaca, Ga., he was wounded in the left side by the limb of a tree, having been shot off by a cannon-ball, breaking two of his ribs of left side and fracturing his right leg; and that the said disabilities have continued to the present time.

J. G. Topping, a comrade, testifies that claimant was struck by a falling limb at the battle of Resaca, Ga., on or about May 14, 1864, injuring the small of his back, right leg, and left shoulder, disabling him for military duty; that his testimony is based upon personal knowledge. He reiterates these statements in a letter to the Bureau of Pensions under date of May 24, 1885.

Franklin Baldwin, a comrade, testifies that claimant was injured in the small of his back by a limb shot off by a cannon-ball, at Resaca, Ga., May 14, 1864.

In a letter dated May 23, 1865, Comrade Baldwin states that claimant was wounded across the small of his back, in his testicle and right leg, and that he is suffering from said disabilities at the present time.

J. J. Chambers, of Centralia, Ill., testifies that he has been intimately acquainted with claimant and his circumstances ever since the date of his discharge from the service; that he has suffered continuously on account of injury of his back and left testicle, and that he is now entirely unfit for manual labor in consequence of said disabilities.

William B. Johnson, of Centralia, Ill., testifies that claimant has been constantly disabled for manual labor by reason of disease of back and left testicle.

Dr. E. B. Marshall, of Centralia, Ill., testifies that he has been acquainted with claimant ever since the date of his discharge from the service; that claimant is now seventy-one years of age, of good moral character, and is in feeble health, suffering from hydrocele of left side, eczema of right leg, and has often recurrent pain in left chest, much aggravated by increased momentum, supposed to have originated in a fracture of the sixth rib, nearest spinal articulation, with incomplete union, totally disabling him for manual labor.

Dr. R. H. Scott, of Centralia, Ill., testifies that claimant has consulted him at various times since 1865, and that the said claimant has disease of testicle and leg and internal injury of chest, totally disabling him at times for manual labor.

Dr. W. Scott Marshall, of Centralia, Ill., under date of February 23, 1886, testifies that he has been acquainted with claimant from the date of his discharge from the service to the present time; that an examination made this date (February 23, 1886) finds him with a bunch or small tumor on his back, and hydrocele of left scrotum, totally disabling him for manual labor.

A petition from S. G. Burdick, C. C. Estes, E. Probst, G. W. Welden, P. K. Watts, J. W. Dickerson, E. P. Lapham, and one hundred other comrades of Wallace Post, No. 55, Grand Army of the Republic, Centralia, Ill., recites that claimant's three sons, upon whom he depended entirely, are now dead; that they were all in the service, never drew any pension, and died from wounds and diseases incurred in the service of the United States; that claimant is now an old man and disabled by wounds and diseases contracted in the service, so that he is now physically disabled for manual labor; that the small pension of $6 per month is in no way proportionate to his disabilities, and that he has often to be assisted by his comrades and fellow-citizens; that he is a worthy man and has given enough to his country to warrant better treatment.

The board of United States examining surgeons at Vandalia, Ill., by whom claimant was last examined, May 21, 1884, rated him at $10 per month for disability of right leg and left testicle.

Favorable action is warranted from the facts in the case, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. AVIS J. HOCKEY.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I call up the bill (S. 2253) granting a pension to Mrs. Avis J. Hockey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Avis J. Hockey, widow of William Hockey, late a corporal in Company G, Eighteenth Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The committee, after an examination of the papers on file in the above claim, believe that the evidence fully supports the report of the Senate committee in the case, and they therefore adopt that report as their own, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Avis J. Hockey, have examined the same, and report:

The petitioner is the widow of William Hockey, late of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers. She was married to him in 1872; he died in 1883, and she applied for a pension in 1885. Her claim was rejected on the ground that the disease of which he died was not due to his service.

There is evidence to show that he was sick while in the service, and that he was favored with light duty for that reason. It is in evidence that he had lung disease while in the service, and for a considerable portion of the time until he was discharged he was placed on detached duty for this reason. There is evidence, besides the fact of his being accepted after a formal examination, that he was sound before he enlisted.

The testimony of Dr. Obetz, who treated the soldier, is made the basis for the rejection of the claim. His statement is peculiar and not consistent. He says his last sickness was malarial fever; that he was apparently doing well; he always found the symptoms mild and favorable, but suddenly he became exhausted and died; "that because of his sudden death and an Army history plainly indicating lung disease, affiant made a post mortem examination of the body in presence of Dr. Smith and others; that before proceeding with the examination he predicted it to be a case of tuberculosis, with the results following or attending the disease;" * * * "that on opening the abdomen and chest his predictions were verified;" and the doctor goes on to describe at length and in technical terms a case of death from long-standing lung affection. A malarial or any other description of fever may have set in when the man approached the last stages of a disease that he evidently contracted in the Army and that had ever since been slowly and surely consuming his life.

In the adverse decision the idea of the soldier's living twenty-two years with that "dread disease, consumption," is the subject of light comment; but it is not inconsistent with experience of doctors or laymen.

It is a well-established fact that he incurred lung disease in the service and that he died of it.

The accompanying bill is reported for the relief of the widow, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES E. KABLER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. RYAN) was the bill (S. 2616) granting a pension to James E. Kabler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James E. Kabler, late a private in Company I, Tenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions in the Senate make the following report, which is adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended:

"James E. Kabler, the claimant under this bill, enlisted as a private soldier in Company I, Tenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, on the 10th day of August, 1862, and was discharged September 17, 1863.

"On May 18, 1870, he made application for pension, alleging in his declaration "that on December 7, 1862, at Ashland, Ky., he contracted quinsy of the jaws and throat, caused by exposure while in the line of duty."

"The claimant swears 'that the quinsy has affected his whole system, causing him to break out in sores over his body, and while so broken out he is unable to perform manual labor. These spells occur in the spring and fall and lay him up one or two months each time, and that he has been disabled one-half since discharge' * * * 'that he is unable to furnish further medical testimony.'

"The Surgeon-General reports him sick, November and December, 1862. Dr. J. F. Fleming, regimental surgeon, swears to treatment of claimant for an affection of the throat, of the nature of quinsy, from September to December, 1863.

"Lieut. George L. McCord swears that claimant contracted quinsy of the jaws and throat by reason of exposure at Ashland, Ky., December, 1862.

"Dr. R. Wells swears that claimant was free from disease when he entered the service, and that he has treated him for quinsy of the jaws and throat from September, 1866, to March 29, 1871.

"F. F. Asbury and B. F. Henderson swear that claimant suffered from and was afflicted with quinsy of the jaws and throat from the time of his discharge to September, 1866, and is suffering from the same at the present time.

"Dr. Shackelford, medical examiner, rates him, under date of November 10, 1870, at one-fourth.

"Dr. Gasten Boyd, Newton, Kans., April 1, 1874, finds 'no disability.'

"Comrade Robert Cooper swears that he knows claimant had quinsy of the throat and jaws at date of discharge, as he was a messmate of claimant and has personal knowledge of the fact. This is corroborated by comrade Mason Cooper.

"Drs. Henry Owens and P. A. Medlin, Wichita, Kans., swear to an examination of claimant, and find him suffering from an affection of the throat and jaws, which disables him one-half from the performance of manual labor, and that they believe his disability to be the effects of quinsy.

"Drs. R. Wells and Nathan Wells; same as above.

"Joseph E. Willis, Henry Vandewarker, and Josiah Porter, neighbors, testify to continuance; * * * that he is frequently confined to his bed, * * * and totally incapacitated for the performance of manual labor one-fourth of the time, * * * and that his condition is such that he ought not to labor at all.

"On December 21, 1881, he was examined by the Wichita board, who report 'no disability from that cause' (quinsy). Dr. James R. Duncan, medical examiner, Newton, Kans., March 21, 1883, says:

"'The claimant is partially incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor * * * and that the disability is probably permanent, * * * and in obedience to special instructions he rates only for quinsy one-fourth.'

"The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim August 25, 1882, on the ground of no disability, due to results of quinsy, on account of which pension is claimed, since the date of soldier's discharge.

"The testimony shows that the disability was contracted in the service, and its continuance clearly established; he is now poor and scarcely able to earn a support for himself and family, and we therefore report the bill favorably, with the recommendation that it pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. GENERAL WARD B. BURNETT.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. STRUBLE) was the bill (S. 681) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett.

Mr. STRUBLE. I desire to make a request in connection with this bill. It is a Senate bill proposing to increase the pension of Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett from $50 to $100 a month. The report is quite lengthy and would require some time for its reading. I am advised that gentlemen here will object to the consideration of this bill to-night. Therefore I ask that the bill take the same course which has been adopted with a number of bills—that it be reported to the House with the understanding that it shall be called up at a day session, that the report shall then be read, and thirty minutes allowed for debate before the bill is put on its passage.

Several MEMBERS. Fix a day.

Mr. STRUBLE. I will say next Friday, a week from to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. I object, unless some other day be named than private-bill day.

Mr. STRUBLE. This is to occupy only thirty minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. But this is a pension bill, and Friday night is assigned specially for such bills. I suggest that next Thursday or next Saturday be fixed.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like, of course, to fix some day which would not be objected to. I will name next Thursday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] moves that this bill be postponed until Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal; that the report be then read, and thirty minutes be allowed for debate before voting on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I suggest that the order stated can not be made by a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is to recommend to the House the action stated.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The request, I believe, was for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman prefers it in that shape it will be so stated.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no preference in the matter.

Mr. STRUBLE. That was the form of the request.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The difficulty in connection with a proposition of this kind is that the bill when fixed for a future day comes in conflict with other business of the House. By an order of the House at a day session we might make such an assignment as this; but I do not think it proper for members at a Friday night session to undertake to fill up succeeding days with business of this sort under a pretense that the previous question is ordered. We go through the form of ordering the previous question, but at the same time we provide for allowing debate and amendment upon these bills. I think it proper that the right to debate and amend should be allowed; but to make an order of this kind under the form of the previous question seems to me very illogical.

Besides, we have had no success whatever in disposing of bills of this character already fixed for certain days. These bills are fixed for a particular day; they come up on that day, then they are postponed to a Friday; and when reached they are postponed again. The Calendar is full of this class of business now.

Mr. STRUBLE. But the gentleman recognizes the fact that under existing conditions it is impossible to dispose of this bill here to-night.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do recognize that difficulty. But I want to call attention to the point made by my colleague [Mr. BUTLER], that by an order of this kind we encroach upon the day session of Friday, which is the only time we have for other private business.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have asked to fix the bill for Thursday next.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understand that. But let me tell the gentleman how these orders operate. We have fixed days in this manner heretofore; when the day fixed has been reached the bills have not been disposed of, and then, under the rules, they drop back to Friday, so that the first thing which comes up on Friday, if private business is entered upon, is bills like this which have come over from Friday night sessions. If this order be made, this bill will be just one other added to the number already upon the Calendar. That would be the effect.

If the House is disposed to do that, I can only say that I think it is a hardship upon the other committees who have no day other than Fridays provided for the consideration of private claims and bills emanating from such committees, and the result of this has been heretofore to deprive those committees of their privileges under the rule. Besides, it is an anomalous position in which to place a bill—ordering the previous question upon it and yet opening it up for debate and amendment.

Mr. STRUBLE. All that I want to do, and I will be glad if the gentleman from Tennessee will suggest some remedy, is to facilitate action upon the bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Missouri has already stated that there are about twenty of these bills made special orders in the manner the gentleman suggests. If gentlemen on the Claims Committee and War Claims Committee and other committees are willing to have the days devoted to private business taken up in that way, I do not think I ought to make any special objection or complaint. But the fact is that bills of this character which have heretofore gone over—and I believe the Chair would so hold if the matter was brought up in a proper way for ruling—would have precedence on the Friday sessions, and would be in order the first thing on Friday unless some other disposition should be made of them.

Mr. PERKINS. By consent, however, they have always been passed over on Friday, and their consideration has not been urged.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am aware of that; but they may be called up at any time. The proper course is to dispose of these at the evening sessions, either to pass them if they are to be passed finally, or let them be killed if they are to be killed finally.

Mr. PERKINS. The difficulty here is to-night that we have no quorum, and that point is made.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Because if gentlemen will consider for a moment they will see what an anomalous position this places us in if the request is complied with. Without the reading of the report, without the consideration of the bill, without knowing anything whatever about its merits or demerits, we go through the form of recommending that the bill, and that is the only way we can get out of committee, be favorably reported, and yet the committee does not know what it is upon its face, or what merits it may possess.

Mr. STRUBLE. It is only a conditional recommendation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not by any means; it is an absolute recommendation; not conditional at all. It comes from the committee with the absolute recommendation of the committee, as absolute as we can make it in any case.

Mr. STRUBLE. But it is always understood to be a conditional indorsement; not a full indorsement.

Now, I desire that justice may be done to this party, and that the bill shall have fair and proper consideration.

Mr. PERKINS. Let the request of the gentleman to set this bill for consideration on next Thursday be submitted to the committee with the right of amendment and debate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will suggest to the gentleman that he allow the bill to remain as it is, and then when it gets into the House let him ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill be fixed for some day next week, and let the House determine it for himself; not go through the form of making an indorsement here of the bill or recommendation in the manner we have been doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that the motion was to report the bill to the House with the recommendation that its consideration be postponed until next Thursday immediately after the reading of the Journal. The Chair, after consultation with the Speaker, abandoned the phraseology which has heretofore prevailed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then it goes virtually, as I said to the gentleman, as fixed for consideration on that day without going through the form of ordering the previous question upon it. We have been heretofore pursuing what appears to be an absurd form of ordering the previous question, and yet negativing its effects by allowing amendment and debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the proposition here after a consultation with the Speaker.

Mr. LAWLER. Why not consider the case now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has stated that the point of no quorum would be made.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have stated and I personally knew that a gentleman would object to the bill, as he has done to similar bills, and I did not care to take up the time of the committee having the report read.

Mr. LAWLER. What is the financial condition of this lady?

Mr. STRUBLE. I understand that her reliance is solely upon the pension she is now receiving. I do not care, however, to go into those questions now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until next Thursday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would inquire if further action in the House is to be taken?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be necessary to do so, as the Committee simply makes a recommendation to the House.

JAMES M'LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. FUNSTON) was the bill (S. 1609) for the relief of James McLaughlin.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of James McLaughlin, late captain of Company I, Tenth Regiment Kansas State Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Committee on Pensions in the Senate sets forth fully the facts in this case and is hereby adopted, and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Senate Report No. 420, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

James McLaughlin was captain of Company I, Tenth Regiment Kansas State Militia Infantry, and in his declaration for pension, filed November 3, 1881, alleges as a basis of his claim that he contracted inflammatory sore eyes at Leavenworth, Kans., in June, 1863, which apparently became better, but when ordered out in 1864 to repel the Price raid he suffered a relapse.

The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim January 22, 1883, on the ground that he was a member of the State militia, and that he did not prosecute his claim to a successful issue prior to July 4, 1874, as provided by paragraph 3, section 4693, of the Revised Statutes. The soundness of Captain McLaughlin prior to enlistment is, we think, fully established.

Dr. G. N. Cooper, of Garnett, Kans., who was the regimental surgeon, testifies "that he has known claimant intimately since 1860, and that when he entered the service he was in good physical health."

Dr. B. M. Ling, Central City, Kans., testifies "he has known claimant during the past twenty-two years (1862 to 1884, when affidavit was filed) and up to October, 1864, he had all the appearances of a sound man."

Dr. Thomas Lindsay, Garnett, Kans. (United States examining surgeon), states, in response to office letter, "that he was claimant's family physician from 1859 to 1862, during which time said claimant seemed to be sound and had no disease of eyes."

As to continuance of disability from date of discharge, Capt. Jonn G. Lindsay swears "that he saw claimant in December, 1864, when he was suffering with sore eyes; again in August, 1865, when he was suffering with same disability, and been thus afflicted ever since, gradually growing worse; at the present he is unable to perform manual labor."

Dr. George W. Cooper, Garnett, Kans., swears that—

"Shortly after claimant's return from the service, October, 1864, he was suffering with sore eyes, and knows from personal observation that he has suffered with same ever since. Claimant is a carpenter by occupation, and in consequence of said disease has been, since the war, unable to successfully follow his occupation."

Dr. M. B. Ling, member of the regiment, swears that claimant has suffered with sore eyes ever since 1864, and, in affiant's judgment, unable to work one-fourth of his time since 1864.

M. A. Page, private Company I, Tenth Regiment, testifies to incurrence during Price's raid, and continuance to present time.

James S. Smith testifies similarly and fixes time of incurrence during Price's raid, and caused by marching over dusty roads.

Dr. Thomas Lindsay, United States examining surgeon, in response to office letter, states "that he treated claimant for granulated sore eyes from 1865 to 1871, after which his professional partner treated claimant for two or three years. Ever since he has been his family physician; at the present time he is nearly blind." Dr. Lindsay, examining surgeon, in his report to the Commissioner of Pensions, reports disability second grade, and rates him at $24 per month.

The character of all the affiants in this case for truth and veracity is satisfactorily established.

Your committee think the claim a very meritorious one.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SUSAN EDSON.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 915) granting a pension to Susan Edson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Susan Edson, doctor of medicine, a volunteer surgical nurse in the late war of the rebellion, at the rate of $25 per month.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 915) granting a pension to Susan Edson, having considered the same, report as follows:

The papers in this case are very voluminous, and the Senate report is altogether too brief. It is necessary only to give some hints as to the great merit of this bill to secure its passage. It was originally introduced into the Senate at $72 per month, but was amended and passed at $25.

Miss Edson and her sister rendered the country invaluable service during the rebellion. Claimant was a physician of high standing, and in the hospitals freely gave to the soldiers the advantage of her medical knowledge. Her sister was a devoted nurse, who by exposure and fatigue in the hospitals laid the foundation of disease which caused her death. She did not apply for or draw pension from the Government.

Miss Edson will be remembered as the faithful attendant upon the late President Garfield. Her unremitting exertions during those long weeks of anxious solicitude completely wrecked her nervous system, and for a long time her life was despaired of, entire seclusion from friends for two years being necessary. Her health was so wrecked when she left the Army that she did not resume the practice of her profession until 1867, and since her illness, following President Garfield's death, she has been utterly unable to do anything in the line of her profession.

She is now advanced in years, utterly broken in health, and without means. She thinks she is entitled to the highest rate of pension paid soldiers, namely, $72 per month, but the Senate amended the bill, and your committee are of opinion that the Senate bill should pass without change, and therefore report it back, with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA E. AMBROSE.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. PUGSLEY) was the bill (H. R. 7508) granting a pension to Julia E. Ambrose.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia E. Ambrose, widow of Joseph N. Ambrose, Company G, Eleventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7508) granting a pension to Julia E. Ambrose, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant's husband, Joseph N. Ambrose, enlisted in Company A, Sixtieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, September 30, 1861, and was discharged therefrom for "functional disease of heart" August 5, 1862. He enlisted in Company G, Eleventh Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, July 21, 1863, as a veteran volunteer, and was discharged as of July 14, 1866. He was pensioned for severe deafness of both ears at the rate of $4 per month, commencing August 19, 1882, and $8 from April 3, 1884. He was adjudged insane and died in Dayton (Ohio) Insane Asylum December 23, 1884.

Dr. C. N. King, superintendent of Dayton Insane Asylum, where soldier was confined, certifies that he died from apoplexy. Dr. King had been in charge of the asylum less than two months at the time of the death; had no previous knowledge of the soldier, and states in an affidavit that he knew nothing about the causes of the soldier's mental and physical trouble. Based alone on the evidence of Dr. King, so far as we are able to discover, the Pension Department rejected the widow's claim for pension.

Dr. B. F. Holmes certifies that he was well acquainted with the soldier prior to his enlistment, and that all external indications denoted good health; that he treated him from the time of his return from the Army until he was admitted to insane asylum (which was November 5, 1883) almost constantly, and is perfectly satisfied that his exposure to cold, long marches, wet weather, and loss of rest was the cause of ill health and death.

Dr. E. Holmes certifies that he was acquanted with soldier about thirty years prior to his death; "examined him and he passed as an able-bodied, sound man at the time of enlistment. * * * Prescribed and treated him at intervals from the time of his discharge up to within a short time before his admission into the asylum for the insane;" that he was "of the opinion that his continuous increasing affections, mental and physical diseases, and death were the natural and irremediable result of the extreme exposure, privations, and suffering incurred while in the service of the United States Army."

It is a case of disagreement of doctors, and we feel justified in giving to this needy widow the benefit of such doubt as there may be by accepting the opinion of the physicians who were well acquainted with the soldier, who treated him, and whose opinion is based on personal knowledge and observation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISHMAEL JONES.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MOFFITT) was the bill (H. R. 889) granting a pension to Ishmael Jones.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ishmael Jones, of Utica, N. Y., late of the Navy.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 889) granting a pension to Ishmael Jones, have considered the same and report as follows:

The claimant, Ishmael Jones, is shown by the records to have enlisted as a seaman on the North Carolina on the 9th of November, 1861, and served thereon until November 28, 1861, when transferred to the Flambeau. He served on the latter vessel until June 18, 1862, and was again transferred to the North Carolina. He was discharged August 5, 1862, for disability.

In his declaration for pension before the Pension Bureau, filed more than eight years ago, he claimed that, while serving on the Flambeau at Port Royal, S. C., in 1862, he was injured on the back above the left hip by a barrel of pork rolling against him and pressing him against the chine of another barrel while he was standing in the hold of the vessel receiving goods which were being lowered to him.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau, March 17, 1882, on the ground of claimant's inability to furnish testimony showing the receipt of the injury at the time and place alleged.

Your committee have carefully examined the testimony in the claim before the Pension Office in connection with the records of the hospital in which claimant was treated, and there has also been filed, directly before the committee, the testimony of responsible and reliable witnesses in support of the claim.

That the applicant, Jones, was a sound, healthy man at enlistment is established by undoubted testimony as well as by the fact of his examination at enlistment. The journals of the Flambeau are not on file, not having been preserved, and inasmuch as claimant was treated on board that vessel for about a month he is deprived, by no fault of his own, of the most usual and valuable evidence of the incurrence of his disability. As a general rule the journals of naval vessels furnish sufficient proof to establish origin in a navy pension claim.

This claimant was transferred from the Flambeau into the naval hospital, Brooklyn, N. Y., on July 18, 1862, with splenitis, with no history of the origin of his disability given, and was discharged therefrom and out of service on the 5th day of August, 1862, because of his weak and enfeebled condition and general muscular and nervous disability, and with the concluding remark that "he will be, for a long time to come, unfit for duty at sea."

It is established by unquestioned testimony of reliable men that upon his return home in 1862 he was severely affected by a lame back and by a pain in the left side of his body, and ever since that time, as the proof shows, he has been similarly affected.

Examining Surgeon Watson, of Utica, N. Y., who made a physical examination of this man in August, 1880, stated:

"I find excessive tenderness on pressure over the left lumbar region, so that the slightest touch causes him to cry out. Stooping causes the most severe pain. I do not see how he can perform any manual labor."

At the examination of the claimant at Rome, N. Y., by Dr. Flandrau, in December, 1881, he found a similar condition, due to disease of back or spine, and also a severe disease of eyes.

The claimant is now in his seventy-third year, is in needy circumstances, and is honest and truthful, as is shown by the statements of Hon. Francis Kernan, late United States Senator from New York, of Judge W. T. Dunmore, and of other prominent men who are acquainted with him.

It is clearly a fact that the disabled condition of the applicant is due to his naval service, and in view of the circumstances of the case your committee are of the opinion that as claimant can find no one who saw him injured, his own testimony should be taken to establish that fact. All presumptions are in his favor that his disability was incurred in line of duty.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATHAN COOK.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. CARLTON) was the bill (H. R. 9228) for the relief of Nathan Cook.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nathan Cook, late of Captain Vincent's company, Georgia Volunteers, Cherokee war, and pay him a pension from the date of his application, at the rate of $25 per month.

The report by (Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9228) granting a pension to Nathan Cook, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The claimant, Nathan Cook, is shown by the records to have served in Capt. Isaac S. Vincent's company, First Regiment Georgia Volunteers, Cherokee war, from May 14, 1838, until June 26, 1838, when discharged. He filed his claim before the Pension Bureau on September 18, 1883, declaring that while in said service diarrhea and neuralgia were incurred and have continued to disable him ever since. There is filed in his pension claim the testimony of his comrades and of neighbors showing that said diseases existed during his service and ever since.

The board of examining surgeons, at Atlanta, Ga., in November, 1883, found him disabled severely by neuralgia, and rated his disability at $6 per month.

He is now eighty-five years of age, is in poor circumstances, and is burdened by the support of two invalid daughters who are entirely dependent upon him.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

J. W. PORTER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4702) to pension J. W. Porter.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-rolls of the Government the name of John W. Porter, late private of Company E, Battalion of Missouri Mounted Volunteers, application numbered 11953, for services in the Army of the United States in the establishment of military posts, and for services on the frontier during the war with Mexico, subject to the limitations and regulations of the pension laws of the United States in pensioning the survivors of the war with Mexico.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4792) granting a pension to John W. Porter, have considered the same, and report as follows:

This claimant was in Powell's Battalion of Missouri Mounted Volunteers from August 13, 1847, to November 10, 1848. His claim was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that he was not in Mexico, on the frontiers thereof, nor en route thereto.

A report from the Adjutant-General United States Army shows that this man was enlisted in Powell's Battalion, Missouri Mounted Volunteers, at Fort Leavenworth, to serve during the war with Mexico. The command marched from Fort Leavenworth on or about September 1, 1847; arrived at Fort Kearney September 18, 1847; remained at said fort until the middle of May, 1848; marched thence to Fort Childs, Platte River, where it arrived June 1, 1848; remained at said fort until September and October, 1848, when it returned to Fort Leavenworth and was mustered out.

The Adjutant-General further states that although the battalion was called into service under the act of Congress of May 13, 1846 (providing for volunteers for the war with Mexico), yet it was used for the purpose of laying out a route to Oregon, and did not serve in the war with Mexico.

Your committee are of the opinon that inasmuch as the soldier was mustered for the war with Mexico and his services deflected into another channel by authority of the War Department, and as he has reached the age of sixty-seven years, he should be placed on a parallel with other Mexican volunteers and granted a pension.

The committee return the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA A. WOODS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8885) granting a pension to Eliza A. Woods.

Mr. WICKHAM. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to inscribe on the pension-rolls the name of Eliza A. Woods, widow of Richard Woods, who was an ensign and lieutenant in Captain Jones's company, Colonel Anderson's regiment of United States Infantry, war of 1812, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8885) granting a pension to Eliza A. Woods, have considered the same, and report as follows:

It appears from the records of the War Department that Richard M. Woods was appointed an ensign Twenty-fourth United States Infantry on April 26, 1813, promoted third lieutenant May 13, 1813, and second lieutenant December 18, 1813. His services terminated in 1815 under act of disbandment of the Army, approved March 3, 1815.

He was married to the claimant, Eliza A. Woods, on the 3d day of June, 1824, and lived with her until his death, in 1845.

In 1846 or 1847 the claimant again married one A. R. Anderson, but lived with him only a few years, he having deserted her about 1852; and for that reason and cruelty she was divorced from him February 24, 1855, and was directed by the decree of divorcement to change her name to that of her first husband, Woods. She has since remained a single woman, being a citizen of good moral character.

Her claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground of her remarriage to Anderson after the soldier's death.

The claimant, Mrs. Woods, is now in her eightieth year and in poor and needy circumstances.

In granting pension to widow of a soldier of the Revolutionary war the remarriage of the widow does not operate under the general law to deprive her of a pension if she is a widow at the time of her application for pension, and the Commissioner of Pensions has recommended to your committee that a similar enactment be made to apply to the widows of soldiers of other wars.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and so recommend.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY NEWTON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9227) for the relief of Mary Newton.

Mr. CARLTON. I ask for the consideration of that bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary Newton, the daughter and only surviving heir of John Jordon, of the Continental Line, in the war of the Revolution, and to pay her at the rate of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9227) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Newton, have considered the same, and report:

That the claimant, Mrs. Mary Newton, is the only surviving child of John Jordon, who was a soldier for three years in the war of the Revolution. She is now in her eighty-fifth year, having been born, as shown by the family record before your committee, on the 2d day of July, 1804, and in her old age applies to Congress for relief.

It is shown by the records of the soldiers who served in the Virginia Continental line that John Jordon served as bombardier in Colonel Harrison's regiment of artillery (Virginia quota) for three years from and after the 20th of December, 1776. A land-warrant was issued to him by the State of Virginia in November, 1783. It appears that during his term of service he was captured by the British and confined on board a prison-ship for over three months.

The identity of the soldier who rendered the above-mentioned service with the father of the applicant is fully established by the testimony of very estimable people, whose affidavits were filed in the pension claim of the widow of the soldier more than forty years ago. One of these witnesses, Jincey Riddle, testified that when she was a small child she well remembers John Jordon came to her father's house in Greenville County, Virginia, having just been released from a British prison-ship, and that there was a great stir among the women of the settlement to have some clothes made for the soldier before he went back again to join the Army.

The death of the mother of the applicant occurred on the 6th day of July, 1847.

Your committee return the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARTIN M'LAUGHLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. MOORE) was the bill (H. R. 8697) to increase the pension of Martin McLaughlin, a survivor of the Mexican war, and late a private in Company D, Third United States Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Martin McLaughlin, a survivor of the Mexican war, and late a private in Company D, Third United States Infantry, to $25 per month, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8697) granting an increase of pension to Martin McLaughlin, have considered the same, and report:

That the claimant was a soldier in the Mexican war, serving in Company H, Third United States Infantry, in Mexico, from March 19, 1847, to the close of the war. He is in receipt of a pension at the rate of $8 per month under the act of January 29, 1887. This bill provides an increase of his pension to $25 per month, because of his physical and financial disabilities.

The evidence before your committee shows that the claimant is seventy-eight years old; is disqualified for the performance of any manual labor by reason of rheumatism, and has no means of subsistence beyond his small pension and charity.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN M'KERNAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. HERMANN) was the bill (S. 1325) for the relief of John McKernan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to place the name of John McKernan, of the Soldiers' Home, Washington City, D. C., on the pension-roll, on account of disability contracted while in the service of the United States as a second-class private of ordnance in the Ordnance Department of the Army, at Benicia arsenal, California.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1325) granting a pension to John McKernan, have considered the same, and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, adopting as their report the statement of facts correctly set forth in the Senate committee report, as follows:

"The soldier who sues for a pension in this case is sixty-four years of age, and has been in the military service continuously twenty years. He claims that he is suffering from a disease of the feet, the medical name of which he does not know. The Adjutant-General's report gives a history of his long service, and that of the Surgeon-General thus identifies his disability:

"'Entered post hospital, Benicia Barracks (arsenal), California, December 9, 1884, from quarters, with eczema of both feet, originating in line of duty (report for April, 1885, shows chronic eczema of both feet), and was discharged from service May 27, 1885, on expiration of term of service; disease originating in line of duty; cure incomplete.'

"Thus it appears that he contracted the trouble from which he suffers in the line of his duty, and that the army surgeons were unable to cure him.

"At the bottom of the Surgeon-General's report there is this note:

"'Attention is invited to indorsement of Maj. C. C. Bayne, surgeon United States Army.'

"This is what Surgeon Bayne says:

"'The within-named man was admitted to the Soldiers' Home June 19, 1885, he having served over twenty years as a soldier. He underwent no physical examination on admission. He reported at sick-call July 1, 1885, with chronic eczema of leg. He is now a patient in this hospital, suffering from the effects of habitual intemperance.'

"The committee are unable to determine whether intemperance has aggravated the disease or the disease has aggravated intemperance. Accepting the proof as it is furnished, both exist, and one is pensionable.

"During the service of twenty years the soldier was not accused of intemperance until he became an inmate of the Soldiers' Home. The committee have no evidence that it is so, other than the above statement. It is very clear that he has been for a long time a sufferer from an incurable disability, and that he is entitled to a pension. He has no home except that provided by the Government, and by his long service he has earned the consideration due to his infirmities and poverty."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET STAFFORD WORTH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 867) granting a pension to Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. FINLEY. This bill grants a pension of $50 a month, and as its consideration will meet with opposition, I ask that it go over till Thursday next.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN W. REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. ROMEIS) was the bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John W. Reynolds, late of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds, having considered the same, report as follows:

They adopt, and make part hereof, the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The Senate report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 465, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to John W. Reynolds, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill to this was reported by your committee at the last session. Your committee adopt the report of the Forty-ninth Congress, which is as follows:

The claimant was an acting deputy provost-marshal in the twelfth Ohio district during the latter part of the war of the rebellion, and while under orders of the provost-marshal of that district, on the night of the 6th of January, 1865, in the attempt to arrest a party of deserters, he was seriously and permanently crippled.

His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that he was not regularly mustered into the United States service.

Fred. F. Rempel, who was a deputy provost-marshal, serving under Capt. George W. Roby, provost-marshal of the twelfth Ohio district, swears that—

"John W. Reynolds was serving under his orders as assistant deputy provost-marshal of the twelfth Ohio district, in the county of Hocking; that on or about the 26th day of December, 1864, the said John W. Reynolds received the proper orders to arrest two persons by the names of George and Jacob Strohl, who had been drafted and were concealing themselves at the house of William Strohl, in said county; that the said Reynolds met with resistance in attempting to make said arrests, and was badly injured; that he was for a long time thereafter badly crippled and totally disabled; that said Reynolds was a brave, judicious, and reliable officer, and performed a large amount of valuable service in the department in which he was engaged as such provost-marshal."

David Whitcraft and George Whitcraft testify—

"That they accompanied John W. Reynolds as a part of his posse in his efforts to arrest George and Jacob Strohl, two draft deserters, who were concealed in the house of William Strohl, in Marion Township, Hocking County; that they obtained entrance to said house, and as the said John W. Reynolds was passing up the stairway to the second story the said deserters rolled down upon him a barrel filled with cider; that the said barrel fell against the said Reynolds, pushing him against the wall, dislocating his shoulder, mashing his right hand, and otherwise severely injuring him; that in consequence of his injuries he was for two or three years so badly crippled as to be utterly helpless."

Dr. W. S. Rutter swears that—

"He resides near said J. W. Reynolds; has been his physician for three years; that he has in that time made frequent examinations of the physical condition of said Reynolds; that in the three years last past scarcely a week has passed by without affiant being consulted by him and giving him medicine and advice; that the treatment furnished was for liver trouble, kidney disease, and neuralgia; that the left shoulder is shrunken and shriveled, and the arm of that side is about 6 inches shorter than the other arm, the effect of a downward dislocation of the shoulder-joint. The hand of that arm frequently becomes so nerveless as to be unable to grasp or retain hold of anything.

"The trapezoid bone of the right hand is enlarged, apparently from a former fracture of the bone, causing weakness in the whole hand; that there is visible the resulting depression of the skull from fracture, that probably is the prime factor in the causation of the intense neuralgia; that the whole upper extremity is affected by the neuralgia, and it has so injured the eyesight as to produce alarming defects of vision, and, in my opinion, will finally produce total blindness of one eye at least."

The claimant testifies—

"That his left arm and shoulder are shriveled and shortened about 6 inches, and is almost useless; that the right hand is weakened by a fractured bone, incurred while in the service of his country; that a fracture of the skull occurred at the same time, and causes frequent trouble of the head; that his eyesight is very weak, and one eye almost sightless from the same cause of neuralgia; that he is almost constantly under the care of a physician; that at no time since the 6th of January, 1865, has affiant been free from pain, and that his pain and disability are growing more and more intense from year to year."

Your committee are of the opinion that this is a just claim, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DELIA NEWMAN.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is sick and asked me to request consideration of the bill (H. R. 7013) to place the name of Delia Newman on the pension-roll. It is on the sixty-fourth page of the Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Delia Newman, widow of late William Newman, of Company —, —— Regiment of North Carolina troops, of war 1812, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7013) granting a pension to Delia Newman, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The records on file in the Third Auditor's office, Treasury Department, show that the late husband of the claimant served in Capt. James Bradley's company of North Carolina militia from the 20th day of February to the 6th day of March, 1815, a period of fifteen days.

The soldier was granted a land-warrant of 160 acres of land for such service, but his pension claim, as well as that of his widow, the claimant, was rejected on the ground that the service was rendered after February 17, 1815, when the treaty of peace was ratified by the Senate.

The widow and soldier, in their statements in the pension claims, assert under oath that news of the termination of hostilities did not reach the company until the date of discharge therefrom, March 6, 1815, and that the soldier was enrolled as a volunteer many months prior to the date which his service is made to commence by the records on file.

The widow, now in her ninety-second year, applies to Congress for relief by special act.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill should pass, and report it to the House with such recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH C. ANDERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. STRUBLE) was the bill (S. 2370) granting a pension to Sarah C. Anderson and children under sixteen years of age.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah C. Anderson, widow of William H. Anderson, late a private of the Fifth Independent Battery Ohio Light Artillery, and the names of the children under sixteen years of age of said Sarah C. Anderson and William H. Anderson, subject to the limitations and restrictions of the Pension Office.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2370) granting a pension to Sarah C. Anderson, and her children under the age of sixteen, having considered the same, report as follows:

They adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The Senate report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 961, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2370) granting a pension to Sarah C. Anderson, and her children under the age of sixteen, have examined the same and report:

That the claimant is the widow of William H. Anderson, a private in the Fifth Ohio Battery. He enlisted 27th August, 1862, and was discharged June 1, 1863, upon a surgeon's certificate of disability. He continued in ill health constantly from the time of his discharge until 1883, when he became insane, and was committed to the asylum at Long View, Ohio, where he died.

The claim has been rejected upon the ground that the death and disability of the soldier are not traceable to the army service. But it is shown by the testimony of a comrade, Waxel, that he was, while in the service, sent to a hospital of the Government; that he was treated there for brain fever; that he lay for some time suffering from brain fever. After his discharge it seems, from both lay and medical testimony, that he was afflicted with chronic diarrhea (never cured), and with epilepsy on several occasions; and that while he was being so treated the physician noticed plain symptoms of dementia even before his committal for insanity.

We think, although the connection between the mortal disease and the original ailment may not be medically or pathologically established, yet it is reasonably shown that there was such connection, and that the soldier's insanity and death were the results of his service in the Army.

The passage of the bill is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL E. WILSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois) was the bill (H. R. 8941) for the relief of Samuel E. Wilson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Samuel E. Wilson, late a member of Company G, Fifty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, and pay him a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 8931, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

That Samuel E. Wilson was a corporal in the Fifty-sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, enlisted November 13, 1861, and discharged September 8, 1862; that the basis of his claim for pension is that about July, 1862, while in the line of duty at Clear Creek, Miss., he was ruptured. And the reason that the claim was rejected by the Department is that claimant was ruptured prior to his enlistment.

It appears in the testimony that David A. Nation, after being duly sworn, testifies that he and said claimant belonged to the same company; that he was present when the examining surgeon received said Samuel E. Wilson into the service; that he saw him stripped, and so far as he could discern was a sound man and free from rupture.

William C. Hearl, residing at Fairfield, Wayne County, Illinois, after being duly sworn, also testifies that he has been acquainted with said applicant since he was about eight years old; that they frequently were in swimming together, and that to his certain knowledge said claimant, up to the date of his enlistment, showed no sign of rupture.

Henry J. Jamison, after being duly sworn, testifies that he belonged to the same company as the claimant; that claimant was a good soldier, always ready for duty, until about July 1, 1862, when he was ruptured while on what was known as Ripley's march.

William C. Upton, being sworn, also testifies that he was a private in Company G, Fifty-sixth Illinois; that he saw the claimant naked in the month of June, 1862, and that he was not ruptured at that time.

Your committee have concluded from the evidence in this case that at the time of his enlistment said Samuel E. Wilson was a sound man, and that he was disabled by rupture while in the line of duty, and that he is justly entitled to a pension, and we therefore respectfully recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FLORA HEATH.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 5529) granting a pension to Flora Heath.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Flora Heath, an invalid daughter of Samuel Heath, late a private of Company C, Third Regiment Indiana Cavalry, in the war of the rebellion, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5529) granting a pension to Flora Heath, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The claimant in this case is the crippled daughter of Samuel A. Heath, who was killed in action at Roddle Shop, Virginia, June 13, 1864. The claimant was pensioned as the minor child of the deceased, and said pension ceased when she became sixteen years old, February 21, 1876. The evidence of Aaron Hawkins and William Fewell is to the effect that they know of their own knowledge that the said Flora Heath was born a cripple, and is a cripple, and that her father was her only support, and that her father and mother are both dead.

This is all the evidence there is in the case, but your committee believe it is sufficient to justify Congressional action, and therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET J. M'QUARY.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 8571) granting a pension to Margaret J. McQuary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Margaret J. McQuary, daughter of Perry McQuary, late a sergeant of Company B, Ninety-ninth Indiana Volunteers, who was killed in battle before Atlanta, Ga., July 28, 1864, upon the pension-rolls, at the rate $30 per month, subject to the rules and regulations of the Pension Department.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8571) granting a pension to Margaret J. McQuary, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The claimant herein is the daughter of Perry McQuary, who was killed in battle on the 28th of July, 1864, while a member of Company B, Ninety-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. Her mother was a pensioner by reason of the death of her husband and the claimant's father, but having remarried, her pension was dropped. Her second husband is also dead, and she is now in extreme poverty.

Dr. Hanna, who has known and prescribed for her the past eight years, testifies that she is a poor, pitiful, distressed girl, a perfect wreck, both physically and mentally; that she has suffered from physical debility ever since he knew her, eight years ago, and her mental unsoundness is congenital. She is living with her mother, who is in extreme poverty, having canceled her pension by second marriage, and has no income or means of support except the little she can do by manual labor.

The claimant is shown to be a person of unsound mind by the official records of Hancock County, Indiana, where said claimant resides, and it is also shown that she has no estate and no means of support, and is totally unable and unfitted to earn her own living. The committee are of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

Your committee therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

In line 5 strike out the words "of unsound mind." In line 9 strike out the word "thirty" and insert the word "eighteen."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MINOR CHILDREN OF JOSEPH SAWYER, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar, called up by Mr. PARKER, was the bill (H. R. 10126) for the relief of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased, late superintendent of the Life-Saving Service in the tenth district of the United States, and who was drowned while serving in the line or his official duty, and to pay them a pension from and after the passage of this act as now provided by law for the minors of a deceased captain of the Navy.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10126) granting a pension to the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The following letters from the honorable Secretary of the Interior and from the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service indicate the length of the officer's service and the manner of his death, with other important information pertinent to the matter of the bill, namely:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a letter of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service in response to your communication of the 25th ultimo, transmitting a copy of bill H. R. 461, "for the relief of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased," and requesting that the Committee on Pensions be furnished with such information and suggestions as he might think it desirable for the committee to have before them in connection with the consideration of said bill.

Very respectfully,

C. S. FAIRCHILD, Secretary.

Hon. A. M. BLISS,
Chairman of the Committee on Pensions,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT U. S. LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to state that I have received from the chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives bill H. R. 461, "for the relief of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased," with the request that the committee be furnished with such information and suggestions as I may think desirable for them to have in connection with the consideration of said bill.

In response I herewith submit for transmission to the committee a copy of the annual report of the Life-Saving Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, on pages 59 to 64 of which is given a circumstantial account of the manner in which Mr. Sawyer lost his life and a brief statement of his connection with the service, which also shows the estimation in which he was held by the officers in charge.

He assumed the duties of his office January 12, 1876, and died October 20, 1880, making the term of his service four years nine months and eight days. His salary during this time was at the rate of $1,000 per annum. The district which he supervised was a large and important one, and the compensation of his successor was increased about a year and a half after his death, to $1,800 per annum by the act of May 4, 1888.

There is no statute making provision for the widows and children of the district officers of the Life-Saving Service in the event of their death in the line of duty, section 8 of the act of May 4, 1882, being applicable only in the case of keepers of stations and their crews.

Mr. Sawyer is the second district superintendent who has lost his life by drowning in the discharge of his official duty; the other being John J. Guthrie, late superintendent of the sixth district, who perished in an attempt to render assistance at the wreck of the United States ship of war Huron, on the coast of North Carolina, on November 24, 1877. In this case Congress authorized a pension to be paid his widow at the rate provided for a deceased captain of the Navy (see act of May 25, 1878, Statutes at Large, volume 20, chapter 130, page 533).

Respectfully, yours,

S. I. KIMBALL,
General Superintendent.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Pages 59, 60, and 61 of the Annual Report of the Life-Saving Service for 1881 are devoted to a circumstantial account of the brave and courageous manner in which Captain Sawyer met his death by drowning while in the performance of his official duty.

The widows and children of keepers and members of crews of the Life-Saving Service are provided for for the period of two years at the full pay of the husband or father. No such provision exists for the relief of the relatives of a superintendent. Congress has, in the case of Superintendent Guthrie, deceased, granted a pension to his surviving widow.

It is shown by evidence before the committee that the wife of Captain Sawyer died seven months prior to his lamentable death, and that by his death his five children were left destitute; the eldest is now cared for by a maternal uncle, but the four youngest, all under sixteen years of age, are supported by a maiden sister of Captain Sawyer, whose chief support is obtained by the use of her needle.

His children are bright and intelligent, and your committee believe they are justly entitled to the aid of the Federal Government in providing for their support and education.

Captain Sawyer, it may be proper to state, had also an honorable service in the Navy, as an officer, from December 7, 1863, until November 22, 1865. He was a brave and devoted officer in both of his services.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Before the reading of the report was concluded,

Mr. MCMILLIN said: I think it is due to the House to save what time we can and give it for pension bills, especially where we take the course that I shall be compelled to take in regard to this bill. This is entering upon a new line of pensions—pensions for the civil service. I have ever held, and this House has held, so far as I know, that pensions of this kind should not be allowed, but that pensions should be granted only to those who have been in some way connected with the military service of the United States. This is a case of civil service, and although it may have been hazardous service, I believe it is not that class of service for which we have heretofore granted pensions. I want to state that I do not think we should lose further time in reading the report.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman is evidently not fully informed, as this does not enter on a new line of cases. There are two lines of legislation under which this falls. One is the legislation under a general law and the other is a specific case. The specific case is that of Capt. John Guthrie, late superintendent of the Sixth district of the Life-Saving Service, who perished in an attempt to render assistance at the wreck of the ship Huron on the coast of North Carolina in November, 1877. The general cases are under section 8 of the act of May 4, 1882, where keepers of stations or their crews in the Life-Saving Service are allowed pensions amounting to pay for two years. This falls in these two lines of cases.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The special case I suppose went through, as this was likely to have done. If there is a general law covering this case, the pension can be granted under it. I do not believe it is wise or proper to go into pensioning persons in the civil service. I made the suggestion that the reading of the report be dispensed with in order that we might save time. I do not want to stand in the way of others who desire to have their pension claims considered in the time that is allotted for that business to-night.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to say that if the gentleman will look into the law he will find that it only covers keepers of stations and their crews. This man, being a superintendent, does not come under that law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not think it is wise or proper to extend the laws in that direction. I will look into the general law before I would finally make resistance to the case that would defeat it. But with the present knowledge I have on the subject I think my duty would constrain me to obstruct the passage of this bill.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SENEY. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withhold that request for a moment. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Ask it afterwards.

Mr. SENEY. I will ask it now.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PARKER. I will ask that this case of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased, be passed over until the next meeting and retain its right to be heard.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to that, I think that is proper; and in the mean time I will examine the law.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion of Mr. CHIPMAN that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had according to order had under consideration sundry pension bills, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. ROMEIS. Mr. Speaker, is it in order at this time to move to take up a pension bill that is in the House undisposed of?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. ROMEIS. Then I move to take up House bill 8553, which is in the House undisposed of. It is different from other bills that have been passed over, because it simply provides for a pension of $12 a month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill to which the gentleman refers is one of several which were favorably reported by the Committee of the Whole at an evening session, the previous question ordered upon them, and a day fixed for their consideration, but when that day came they were not considered and they went back to the Calendar. The Chair is inclined to think that they would come up as unfinished business if the point were made and insisted upon. The Chair will state further, however, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROMEIS] that the bills of which his was one will come up in their order, and that if that calendar is returned to now and the regular order is insisted upon, the gentleman's bill will not be the first.

Mr. ROMEIS. I do not wish to interfere with the business of this evening. I simply asked for information, not knowing when the bill would properly come up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Calendar on which the gentleman's bill is will come up if it is insisted upon, but, as the Chair has stated, the gentleman's bill is not the first upon that Calendar.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration House bill 4855, granting a pension to Jacob Newhard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bills that have been reported from the Committee of the Whole will be first disposed of; after which the gentleman will be recognized to call up his bill.

Mr. SENEY. Is not my request in order at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is in order. The Chair was only stating to the gentleman what the custom had been. The Chair will recognize the gentleman later.

Mr. SENEY. In reply I beg to state to the Chair that I have been the victim of that custom, and I do not propose to be victimized again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is proper for the Chair to state to the gentleman from Ohio that it has not been the purpose of the Chair to victimize him.

Mr. SENEY. I was not intimating that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will also state to the gentleman that in the number of years that the present occupant of the chair has occupied it at these evening sessions for pension bills requests for unanimous consent have uniformly been entertained after the business reported from the Committee of the Whole has been disposed of; but if there is no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio to make his request now.

Mr. SENEY. If the whole time remaining was consumed in the passage of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole and the hour for adjournment came, it would then be too late to make my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will assure the gentleman from Ohio that there is no danger of the whole of the time being consumed in the passage of these bills. The Chair will endeavor to recognize the gentleman from Ohio to make his request. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 4855——

Mr. LAWLER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for. The Clerk will report the first bill.

ALBERT WATSON.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9824) for the relief of Albert Watson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering this bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SENEY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, no 1.

Mr. SENEY. No quorum.

Mr. CANNON. May I be allowed a word?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Albert Watson, as the report states, is the only son of a deceased soldier. He has a step-mother who has remarried. He is deformed; his breast caved in; he has curvature of the spine; he is nineteen years old and requires a constant attendant, and he subsists upon charity. This bill gives him a pension of $18 a month. His father had a pension. His step-mother had a pension which she drew until she remarried. The case is all perfectly clear and plain, as shown by the report. The papers were filed and I examined them myself; and I am quite sure that my friend from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] when he understands the case as reported by the committee will not demand a quorum upon this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted, and the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. SENEY. I have been here night after night for no other purpose than to get a single pension bill passed, and it is the only bill that I have asked the House to pass during this session of Congress. Upon two occasions I left the House on the adjournment of these evening sessions, having had no opportunity whatsoever to present my request to have this bill considered. I propose now to stand upon my rights, whatever they are, and insist upon them. I am a friend of pensions and I vote for all pension bills; so the gentleman [Mr. CANNON] can not outdo me in that. I take this course for no other reason than that I want to have my claim recognized. I feel that my bill is entitled to recognition, and if I can not have it recognized I do not propose that others shall be. Fifteen minutes ago a gentleman told me that he had got two pension bills through to-night, and I certainly ought to have one.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I understood the Chair to state that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] would be recognized immediately after the passage of these bills reported from the Committee of the Whole. There are twenty or twenty-five of these bills which propose to pension soldiers perhaps just as worthy as the soldier represented by the gentleman from Ohio. We who attend these meetings every Friday night know that fifteen minutes will not be required to pass these twenty-five bills. When they have been passed, the gentleman from Ohio will be recognized to call up his bill.

Mr. SENEY. Suppose the hour for the termination of this evening session is reached before my bill is called? That condition of things has hit me twice; I do not propose it shall strike me a third time.

Mr. DOCKERY rose.

Mr. FARQUHAR and others. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will act as tellers. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LAWLER (during the count by tellers). I would like consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is dividing.

Mr. LAWLER. The Chair might ask a suspension of the count for a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman from Minnesota to make a statement?

Mr. LAWLER. I object; all these things take up time.

Mr. NELSON. I think my suggestion will help us out of this difficulty.

Mr. LAWLER. If the tellers will suspend the count for a moment I think I can relieve this difficulty. Seeing that probably the time will permit only the passage of these bills reported from the Committee of the Whole, and also that of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY], I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that this count be temporarily suspended and that the gentleman from Ohio may be recognized to call up his bill.

Several members objected.

Mr. HOUK. The bills could all have been passed by this time.

The tellers reported—ayes 38, no 1.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum has yet voted.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to suspend this count in order to allow me to have passed a bill for the benefit of an old woman, now more than eighty years of age, who, I am afraid, will not live to see many more Friday nights. She is a colored woman, too.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. No quorum has yet voted. Gentlemen who desire to vote will please come forward and do so.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to put on its passage the bill which I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] states that he desires to have considered a bill which is some distance forward upon the Calendar. He states that he is very desirous of having this bill passed, and will demand a quorum unless it receives consideration. The reply has been made to him that there is plenty of time to pass all these bills which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole and then to pass his bill. So there is. Now, although some gentlemen may think the gentleman from Ohio is a little stubborn, yet even if that be so, I ask that the rest of us show ourselves not so stubborn, and that we now, by unanimons consent, allow him to call up his bill and have it considered and passed. There will then be time enough to pass these bills from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PERKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The regular order is the vote by tellers. No quorum has yet voted.

Mr. SENEY. I have already stated that on two former nights I have acted upon the idea that as soon as the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole were passed I should be recognized; but on both occasions the gavel of the Presiding Officer fell before I had such opportunity, and the House adjourned.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman has already been informed by the Chair that he will be recognized as soon as these bills reported from the Committee of the Whole have been passed. If he will withdraw his objection, these bills can be passed in ten minutes, leaving ample time for the passage of his bill. Under these circumstances, for him to stand here and say that unless his bill is taken up out of its order nothing shall be done, appears to me an insult and an outrage inflicted upon the House.

Mr. CANNON. I feel as though I am somewhat "outraged;" still I ask that the gentleman from Ohio, although his request may seem unreasonable, be recognized in order to have his bill passed; then we can pass these other bills reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole. There is time enough for all.

Mr. PERKINS. I have no bill to be considered to-night, and hence I have no personal interest in this question. If other gentlemen are anxious that this House should surrender to the gentleman from Ohio, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. LAWLER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum has voted; and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, the only alternative left us is a call of the House or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. NELSON. There is a way out of the dilemma. I ask unanimous consent that all bills reported from the Committee of the Whole to-night, together with the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, shall be considered as engrossed and read the third time and passed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. CANNON. If the point of no quorum can be waived for a moment, if in order to do so, I will move to go back into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SENEY. I am perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. PERKINS. Before that I would like permission to make a single request; that is, that the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio be considered as having been recommended by the Committee of the Whole favorably to the House, and that it be presented to the House for action with the other bills from the committee.

Mr. SENEY. That is exactly what I want.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I object to that.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now I will ask unanimous consent to waive the question of no quorum with a view to go back into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills on the Calendar.

Mr. SENEY. Then I will withdraw the point of no quorum to allow that motion to be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the unfinished business comes up first, which is the bill under consideration, if the point of a quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it not in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole first?

Mr. SENEY. I remarked to the Chair that I would withdraw the point of no quorum to let in the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. On further thought I will not make the motion.

Mr. KERR. I move that the House do now adjourn, as there is nothing else for us to do.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 21.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the count by tellers.

The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. HOOKER. The question of no quorum was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. LAWLER. It was withdrawn, but it was not accepted by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I beg pardon; I do accept it, but I did not renew the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the point of order is not insisted upon, the Chair will announce the result of the vote.

The vote on the engrossment and third reading of the bill was announced as—ayes 43, no 1. So (no further count being insisted upon) the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the House of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendments, were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (S. 681) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. General Ward B. Burnett; and

A bill (S. 867) granting a pension to Margaret Stafford Worth.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the several votes taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JACOB NEWHARD.

Mr. SENEY. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4855) granting a pension to Jacob Newhard and consider the bill now.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jacob Newhard, of Carey, Wyan-dot County, Ohio, late a lieutenant in Company F, One hundred and first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? The Chair hears none.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SENEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARGARET B. TODD.

Mr. FULLER. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 645) granting a pension to Margaret B. Todd.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES WALSTER.

Mr. LAWLER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5503) granting a pension to Charles Walster:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Charles Walster, late a private in Company C, Thirteenth Illinois Cavalry, and Company M, Second Illinois Light Artillery, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws governing invalid pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAWLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 6, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, offered the following prayer:

Lord, make us to know our end and the measure of our days, what it is, that we may know how frail we are. We worship Thee, the only living and true God. Oh, Thou, who livest and wast dead and art alive forevermore, we thank Thee for the life beyond. Give unto us grace to lay hold upon the things that are substantial and enduring. We thank Thee for the way of life made so plain. Give unto us wisdom to walk in that way day by day. For the light that comes from heaven upon earth's dark pilgrimage we bless God, in whom there is no darkness at all. Shine unto us, we pray Thee, by Thy divine light, and make very plain to us Thy righteous will, strengthening us in duty and leading us where we ought to walk.

Thou Judge of the widow and the Father of the fatherless ones, we commend unto Thee those who are bereft, and pray that Thou wilt deal very tenderly with them. Sustain and comfort and sanctify them. Teach us all so to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Help us ever to remember that there is but a step between us and death, and so to live wisely and holily, serving our generation, that when we shall fall asleep we may be gathered unto our fathers.

Sanctify to us the rest and privileges of the past Sabbath day, that the seed scattered everywhere may be watered by heavenly influences, and that this land so abundantly blessed may be Emmanuel's land. Guide these Thy servants to-day; grant us grace and peace, in the name of Christ. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

DEATH OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer resolutions at this time on a subject that every Senator will understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has learned with profound regret of the death of Philip H. Sheridan, late General of the Armies of the United States.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its grateful sense of his great and patriotic services in the cause of the country, and its deep sensibility of the loss the nation has sustained by his death, and its sympathy with his family in their bereavement.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of these resolutions?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is quite unnecessary for any Senator to submit any observation in support of these resolutions. The career of General Sheridan has been so conspicuous, so gallant, so noble, and so patriotic that any words I could use in respect of his memory or in praise of his career would be like gilding refined gold or painting the lily. I, therefore, for my part, leave them to the judgment of the Senate without any further observation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolutions, the question is on their adoption.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of New York and a petition of citizens of Polk County, Iowa, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of the Mills bill without striking out the item of "stones, unmanufactured or undressed; freestone, granite, sandstone, and all building or monumental stone" from the free-list; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the restriction of Chinese immigration; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REAGAN presented the petition of Joseph P. Richard and 24 other citizens of Frederick County, Virginia, and the petition of T. J. Standford and 25 other citizens of Van Zandt County, Texas, praying for the passage of additional amendments to the interstate-commerce law prohibiting railroad companies from transporting commodities in cars belonging to the shippers, and giving the fines imposed for violations of the interstate-commerce law to the informers; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Margaret Bolio, of Detroit, Mich., widow of Gideon Bolio, late a private in the Second Michigan Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of 81 veterans of the war of 1861, now inmates of the soldiers' home at Marshalltown, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the limitation on the arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FARWELL presented four petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill 3375, providing for the adjustment of claims for damages to real estate by reason of public improvements in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a petition of merchants, business men, and farmers, citizens of Bradley County, Arkansas, praying, in view of the exceeding high prices asked for bagging by parties controlling the market, and in order to afford relief to cotton producers by lessening the price of that commodity, for the passage of a bill abolishing the duty on bagging; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Bourbon County, Kansas, praying for certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition signed by the members and all the officers of the Kansas State Farmers' Alliance, praying that the Senate will pass the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives for the establishment of a department of agriculture, and calling attention to the fact that at a meeting of the executive board of the National Farmers' Alliance, held at Des Moines, Iowa, in March last, said national executive board did formulate a memorial asking Congress to enact a law to create a department of agriculture and make the same an executive department.

A bill for this purpose is on the Calendar now, having been reported from the Committee on Agriculture a few days ago. I then gave notice that at an early day I would move its consideration by the Senate. I now repeat that notice, subject, of course, to the appropriation bills and to the measure now pending before the Senate known as the fisheries treaty; but as soon as this business now pending is disposed of and out of the way I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill which I have mentioned. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8674) for the relief of Sterling H. Tucker and others, to report it favorably without amendment. It is proper for me to state that the chairman of the committee [Mr. EDMUNDS] dissents from the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I also report from the same committee the bill (S. 3297) for the relief of Sterling H. Tucker and others, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, as it is upon the same subject.

The report was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should be very much gratified if the Senate would give unanimous consent to the consideration of House bill 8674, for the relief of Sterling H. Tucker and others, just reported by the Senator from Iowa. It is a House bill reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I could not consent to that in the absence of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The chairman of the committee dissents from the report, and will doubtless desire to be present when the bill is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3280) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house at Heceta Head, Siuslaw River, Oregon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3237) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-ship, to be provided with fog-signal apparatus, outside of the bar of the Columbia River, on the Pacific coast, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3281) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house on Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory; and

A bill (S. 3282) making an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the construction of a light-house and fog-signal on Patos Island, Washington Territory.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2440) for the relief of the State of Oregon;

A bill (S. 36) to amend chapter 893 of the laws of the Forty-ninth Congress; and

A bill (S. 3119) amendatory of the act for the benefit of the States of Texas, Colorado, Oregon, Nebraska, California, Kansas, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, and Nevada when a Territory.

Mr. STEWART. In lieu of the bills just postponed indefinitely I introduce a bill. I also present accompanying statements and documents, which I ask may be printed and referred with the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 3420) authorizing the Secretary of War to ascertain what amount of money has been expended by the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada for military purposes in aid of the Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to state in this connection for the information of the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST], that in a few days I shall introduce a bill with accompanying documents to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs as a substitute for his amendment, providing for the payment of Indian war claims of California.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator wants to have the accompanying statements printed?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I desire to have the statements printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand the Senator desires to have a limited number printed for the use of the committee and not the 1950 copies usually ordered. So many will not be required.

Mr. STEWART. I understand they may be required, as they will also be for the use of the War Department. In the bill I have introduced I have adopted the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi

[Mr. WALTHALL] to simply have an inquiry and a report on the facts, and in order to accomplish that object these documents containing the laws will be needed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I only rose to inquire how many were to be printed, and what would be the understanding about it.

Mr. STEWART. We thought it best to have the document regularly printed, because it will have to be used by the War Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. In that way the Senator will not get so many for his own use as if they are printed for the use of the committee. It is a preliminary proceeding anyhow, ordered for the committee.

Mr. STEWART. Then I ask to have 200 copies printed for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

JOHN M. HARRELL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3402) for the relief of John M. Harrell, of the State of Arkansas, to report it adversely with a written report, which, for the convenience of disposing of these disability cases, I ask may be read—it is very short—and if the Senate is willing that the bill be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred Senate bill 3402, "For the relief of John M. Harrell, of the State of Arkansas," respectfully reports that it has had the same under consideration, and recommends that the bill do not pass, for the reason that the person named is, in the opinion of the committee, under no political disability imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution.

It appears from the petition of Mr. Harrell that he was in 1858 appointed United States attorney for the eastern district of Arkansas and resigned said office in 1860, and was afterwards engaged in the military services of the forces of the rebellion.

By force of the fourteenth amendment he was under disability as a person having taken an oath as an officer of the United States to support the Constitution, and having engaged in the rebellion against the same.

But Congress, by the act of 22d May, 1872 (volume 17, page 142, United States Statutes at Large), enacted:

"That all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States are hereby removed from all persons whomsoever, except Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial, military, and naval service of the United States, heads of departments, and foreign ministers of the United States.

The only question, therefore, is whether the petitioner was an officer in the judicial service of the United States by reason of his being an attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas. The committee is of opinion that it is clear he was not an officer in the judicial service. "Judicial service" imports the performance of judicial functions, just as military and naval service import the performance of military or naval functions. Every duty that is imposed by statute upon a district attorney of the United States is clearly, as the committee thinks, an executive duty.

It is obvious that Congress intended, in the act referred to, to except from the general removal of disabilities only high officers of State, military and naval officers, and the members of the two named and their recent Congresses. There was no exception of any officer in the service of the executive branch of the Government except heads of departments, foreign ministers, and those in the military and naval service. It was thus evidently intended that all the officers in the civil service of the executive branch of the Government should be relieved, excepting heads of departments and foreign ministers. In view of the constitutional division of power into three departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—and in view of the general policy of the act referred to and the marked omission of all exceptions in regard to officers in the executive service except those belonging to its military establishment and the heads of departments and foreign ministers, it seems obvious that it was intended by this act of amnesty to relieve all officers of the United States except judges, heads of departments, and military and naval officers. The committee, therefore, deems it to be clear that the petitioner is not under any disability imposed by the fourteenth amendment. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by me and upon my motion referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I received a letter from Col. John M. Harrell, whom I know quite well, stating that he had been nominated for Presidential elector in the State of Arkansas, but that prior to the war he had held the office of United States district attorney and afterwards served in the Southern army. He was in doubt whether the act of 1872 had removed his political disabilities and requested me to inform him in regard to it. After examining the act I applied to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and the only question at issue seemed to be whether a district attorney of the United States was in the judicial service of the United States, those who were in the judicial service having been excepted by the act of 1872, which removed all disabilities except certain exceptions therein named. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary gave me his opinion that Colonel Harrell's disabilities were removed by that act, and that a district attorney was not a judicial officer. Having consulted other members of the Judiciary Committee and a very distinguished lawyer in the Senate who is not a member of the Judiciary Committee, they gave a different opinion, and said that it was important that the question should not be left in doubt.

Knowing that it might become very important, as it was almost absolutely certain that Colonel Harrell would be elected as an elector, I informed him of all the facts. He replied stating that under the circumstances, owing to the importance of the matter, he preferred that a bill should be introduced and should go to the Committee on the Judiciary and let them pass upon it in an official capacity. If they reported that he had no disabilities and the Senate confirmed that report, then probably no question would hereafter be raised about it, but inasmuch as distinguished lawyers differed as to whether the words "judicial service" included a district attorney he preferred that that committee should pass upon it.

For that reason I introduced the bill, knowing that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary held the opinion which is contained in the report, though others held a different opinion.

So far as I am concerned, it is wholly immaterial to me which way the question is decided provided it is decided correctly, as I do not wish any question to arise hereafter. If the Senate, after having fully understood the facts as I have stated them, are unanimously of the opinion that the disabilities of Colonel Harrell were removed by the general act of 1872, then that is satisfactory to me.

I thought it proper that I should make this statement in order that all Senators might fully understand the importance of the question, and also to explain why I had introduced the bill after I had been informed by the chairman of the committee that he thought Colonel Harrell's disabilities had already been removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if this were only a single isolated case of one gentleman, of course if any single Senator had any reasonable doubt about it I should be willing to solve the doubt by passing a bill for him; but passing this bill throws a doubt, a shadow upon the political condition of probably more than a thousand persons in the United States who now understand, as everybody else does, that their political disabilities have been removed by the act of 1872. The committee therefore thought that it was better to follow what we all thought after consideration and discussion was the law, and make this formal report and ask the Senate to adopt it as expressing its judgment upon the matter, and thus not raise a doubt and throw a cloud over the political status of so many other citizens of the United States.

I therefore move that the report be adopted and the bill indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill and the report thereon? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Vermont moves that the report be adopted and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GEORGE. Let the report be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read, the report will appear in the RECORD.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM L. BRADFORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back favorably the bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of Captain William L. Bradford, with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration, as saving time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, in line 3, before the name "William," to strike out the word "Captain;" and in the same line, after the name "Bradford," to insert "late an officer in the Navy of the United States;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the political disabilities of William L. Bradford, late an officer in the Navy of the United States, arising under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford."

PAUL F. FAISON.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report adversely the bill to remove the political disabilities of the gentleman named. When the bill is reported by its title I will state the reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4694) to remove the political disabilities of Paul F. Faison.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This citizen was a cadet at West Point, and being a cadet in 1861 he went home to the State from whence he came, owing the United States nothing, and went into the rebellion. It is clear, perfectly clear from the statutes that he never was under disability at all. He never was an officer of the United States, and could not become so until he had graduated at West Point and been appointed by the President to some branch of the service. So it is clear that this bill is not necessary.

The report was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

COTTON BAGGING.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized and required to inquire into the truth of the alleged combinations or pool of the producers of cotton bagging. Also what companies or individuals compose said pool, their methods of combination and doing business, the effect of the same upon prices of this article of necessity to all cotton producers, together with any and all other matters relating to the same which may call for or suggest legislation by Congress, and report the same to the Senate with such recommendations as the committee may think proper.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, it requires about 50,000,000 yards of cotton-bagging a year to pack the cotton crop. This bagging is manufactured exclusively in the United States and is protected by a tax of 3 cents a yard.

From a statement recently made by one of the manufacturers of this article, it appears that when the price was advanced a year or two ago a very small per cent., there were immediately importations from Scotland and India into this country.

It would seem from this that the entire amount of the protection—the 3 cents a yard—measures the amount of advance that cotton-raisers pay to the bagging manufacturers for this article above what they would have to pay but for the existence of this tariff tax. This would aggregate $1,500,000 per year.

A short time ago there was a proposition made in the House of Representatives to reduce this tax, and a very great complaint was made about it. It is stated in newspapers that representatives of all the manufacturers were here by the dozen, and they were crying out in the greatest distress that their interests would be ruined, that their manufactories would be destroyed, if there was any reduction in the rate of taxation.

The statement was publicly made in the House of Representatives that this bagging could be produced and sold at from 6¾ to 7 cents a yard, by the friends of the manufacturers, but it was also said by the manufacturers themselves that there was "but little profit in the business" at this price, to use their own expression, one stating that when he manufactured the bagging and sold it at 6¾ cents and delivered it a thousand miles from the mills, "the profit had reached an extremely low limit." Nevertheless, I understand that the one bagging-mill in the United States which has not entered this pool has sold its entire product this year at 6 cents a yard, and has declined to enter into this alleged combination.

Among other difficulties that the bagging manufacturers urged upon the attention of Congress when the proposition was made to reduce this tariff tax was the danger of a monopoly by the foreign manufacturers and an increase in the price. This they seemed to regard as a very great danger which threatened the producers of cotton in the United States, and against which they thought they should be protected. I agree with them in their dislike of such combinations, and fully believe that if the power exists in Congress they should be prevented or suppressed.

For two or three years the average price of cotton bagging has been about 7 cents a yard. This year it has been less, about 6¾ cents, and this the manufacturers claim has brought the profit in this article down to a "very low limit," but still they admit that they were making a profit at this price.

I now ask to have read a letter appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PERU, IND., March 10, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Have noticed in the newspapers that the Democratic tariff reformers intend to have burlaps and bagging for covering cotton on the free-list. If this law should go into effect it would totally ruin a very valuable American industry to the amount of several million dollars. The average cotton crop consumes about fifty million yards per annum, which is at present all manufactured in America, and one-half of it in this close vicinity—St. Louis, Mo., Louisville, Ky., and Muncie, Peru, and Huntington, Ind.

Our factory employs at present over one hundred hands, and we turn out over 3,000,000 yards per annum, and we have an investment in this business of over a hundred thousand dollars. There is not the least doubt that our and every other bagging mill in this country would be closed within six months if this law should go into effect.

Now, friend STEELE, we ask you to use all your influence to protect us against such unjust legislation. The present duty is limited enough. Only three years ago, when jute butts were three-quarters of a cent a pound higher than this present time, and American bagging manufacturers advanced the value of bagging 1¼ cents per yard, Dundee, Scotland, jute manufacturers supplied a good portion of the American bagging market. This is to show you that the margin is low enough now with the present tariff. The duty on jute butts ought to be taken off, because there is no jute raised in America, and therefore would harm no one. Thanking you in advance for a reply and early attention,

Am truly yours,

A. LEHMAN,
President Peru Bagging Company.

Hon. GEORGE W. STEELE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. My purpose in asking for that letter to be read is to show first about the amount of money which at a reasonable estimate is involved in the production of this article and then the number of hands employed, to which I desire to call especially the attention of the Senate and of the Committee on Finance.

It appears that this bagging mill, which is capable of producing 3,000,000 yards per year, has cost about $100,000 and employs about a hundred hands. If that is correct, and if that is a mill of average production, the 50,000,000 yards of bagging necessary for the cotton crop of the United States can be produced by mills which would cost $1,600,000, and they would employ 1,600 hands, and on that investment of $1,600,000 the cotton-planters of this country are year by year by the operation of the tax of 3 cents a pound on cotton bagging, paying a bonus of $1,500,000 in taxes as protection to these people. This is to build up by this protection, by this legislative aid, I suppose, an infant industry.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate particularly to the fact that it now appears by the best lights we have that these pets of the Government, these beneficiaries of this bounty have combined to raise the price of their manufactures most unjustly and unreasonably. They have, in reality, advanced the price 4 cents within four days recently, so that bagging which was selling a few days ago at 7 cents or less is now held at 11¾, as the result of this wicked combination amongst these beneficiaries of protection.

When asked for the reasons of this extraordinary advance they decline to reply. But the fact stands that they by this means plunder the cotton-growers this year and out of this crop of between two and three millions of dollars, besides the million and a half which the law has been accustomed to give them.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate, too, to the fact, if it is the truth, and the purpose of the resolution is to direct the Committee on Finance to investigate the facts and to find out what the truth is. If the American people is thus nursing in its bosom a brood of vipers, if you are warming into life a class of men who, not satisfied with a reasonable profit, and not satisfied with the right of levying a tax of a million and a half dollars a year upon cotton producers who have no protection on the face of the globe, are entering into a combination for the purpose of advancing the price of this article of absolute necessity to cotton producers at the rate of 4 cents a yard in four days, that it seems to me there ought to be some remedy at the hands of the public, and it is time that the ax was being laid at the root of the tree.

One of these gentlemen has recently stated that there was no pool in this instance; that the movement was "simply a sympathetic movement." A "sympathetic movement" which robs the cotton producers of this country of more than $2,000,000 on this year's cotton crop alone, not counting the regular tax that the conspirators are allowed to take year by year from the cotton producers of a million and a half dollars, should be promptly declared a public enemy and dealt with as such.

Mr. President, I have heard some very earnest appeals from the other side of the Senate Chamber to the American public for justice to the poor, helpless, ignorant, down-trodden colored man. I hope that the same gentlemen who have been so earnest in their appeals heretofore for the protection of that class of our citizens against wrongs which they allege exist, but which are not proven, will in this case, where the wrong is not denied, where it comes as clear as the shining of the noonday sun that these people are being plundered by a class of people who have been given strength by you, who have been nurtured and fostered by you into life as an infant industry, will agree that this matter shall be examined, and if the American Congress can right the wrong which has been committed in this case I hope they will not fail to do it.

I hope that the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am in sympathy——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was about to say, if I may be allowed——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While I am in sympathy with the idea, I am under the impression that some one or two committees have already authority to investigate all these trusts; and if it be not so, the resolution ought to be broadened so that one committee will cover the whole subject. Therefore, unless there is pressing haste for it, I think it had better lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Vermont before he takes his seat that my reason for proposing that the Committee on Finance be directed to make this investigation was because that committee now has charge of the question of tariff taxes. If I am not mistaken, this thing is directly the outgrowth of a tax which has been levied for the purpose of protecting, as they call it, those making cotton-bagging. If that is the case, it seems to me that this matter ought to be considered in connection with that measure by the Committee on Finance. That is the reason why I have offered the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the objection of the Senator from Vermont, the resolution will lie over and be printed.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in executive session with open doors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The treaty will be reported by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of discussion upon this treaty. There has been a great deal of eloquence expended upon it. There has been a wonderful amount of historical research and legal ability displayed in its discussion. I wish, if possible, somewhat to simplify the issues as they appear to me, and see how they look as viewed by the plain people of the country, who are to be most affected by the result.

That great system of inland seas, the most wonderful perhaps in the world, whose waters march for more than a thousand miles with the northern borders of our country, and then turning due east discharge their mighty floods into the Atlantic Ocean through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, constitutes, with its bays and lakes and estuaries and open waters, one of the most remarkable aquariums of fish in the world—perhaps it is the most valuable fishery on the globe. Prone across the entrance of the Gulf of St. Lawrence lies the island of Newfoundland. Bleak, sterile, and inhospitable, it is swept by the fiercest storms of the Atlantic, and is the summer home of the icebergs that float down from the arctic seas. Whether it is the peculiar temperature of that great flood of fresh and pure waters that discharge there into the sea, or whether it is the peculiar kind of food which nature has collected there for the support of piscatorial life that has gathered there so much of the life of the great deep, I know not, but the fact remains that it is a wonderful fishery, a wonderful and inexhaustible source of wealth to any people who are privileged to enjoy it.

In the original settlement and reclamation of this country that fishery and all of its dependencies were in the possession of the Kingdom of France. By successive wars in the eighteenth century, in which these American colonies took part as members of the British Empire, those fisheries and the lands upon which they depended were wrested from France and became the exclusive property of Great Britain, in the joint enjoyment of which these colonies which afterwards became the United States participated by reason of their being a component portion of the British Empire. In process of time the rupture took place between these colonies and the mother country, and the war which ensued established the separate nationality and independence of these United States. Consequently, apparently and legally their right to participate in those fisheries was gone, as they fell without the line of separation. They therefore pertained to the ownership of the soil which surrounded them and on which they depended. In other words, the party which exercised the dominion of the shore was entitled to the ownership of the fisheries; because I believe it has been established beyond dispute by the discussion which has taken place here and the resurrection of ancient state papers, that the waters in those fisheries were not public but national waters, and pertained, therefore, exclusively to the nation that exercised dominion over the shores on which they depended.

But, however that may be, whether our rights to a common enjoyment of those fisheries were abrogated by the war which separated us from the British empire or not, we were granted a common right of fishery in those same waters by the treaty of 1783, and from that time until the war of 1812 we continued to exercise that right. Then came the war of 1812, and after its conclusion Great Britain insisted that whatever rights we had obtained under the treaty of 1783 were abrogated and forever displaced by the result of that war; and two treaties were formed between Great Britain and the United States at the conclusion of that war in which no mention was made of our fishery rights at all. Finally they were again settled by the treaty of 1818, which seems to have amounted to an admission that the rights which we had acquired under the treaty of 1783 had been abrogated; because, if they remained in statu quo, of course there was no necessity for the treaty of 1818 to establish and perpetuate that which was already in existence.

Now, the treaty of 1818, which has been read so often in your hearing, Mr. President, and has been commented upon so frequently, contained a provision limiting the rights of American fishing vessels in Canadian ports to certain purposes, with the exclusive words "and for no other purposes whatever," and also having granted to American fishermen the right to enter these prohibited ports for certain purposes and forbidden them entrance for all others, the treaty further provided that they should be, when there, subject to certain restrictions for the purpose of preventing their abuse of the privileges which had been granted to them.

Who were to make those restrictions? Who were to enact those laws which were to regulate the visits of our fishermen off the coasts of Canada and Newfoundland? The treaty is silent, but, as a matter of course, as the offenses against the restrictions could only be committed within the jurisdiction of the Dominion of Canada, it necessarily followed that Canada had jurisdiction both to make the "restrictions" and to punish their infraction. They had, therefore, the right to establish those restrictions and regulations. They did establish them. The first restrictive statute, I believe, upon that subject was passed in 1819, and from 1819 to 1854 the restrictions which were imposed by Canada were also enforced by Canada against the fishermen of the United States, I will not say without protest, but certainly without any denial that Canada had the right to do so, or any counter effort on the part of the Government and Congress of the United States to establish different restrictions and regulations, or to intervene in any way, so the treaty was not violated.

From 1819 to 1854 American fishermen were warned off when approaching too near to the shore; they were boarded, they were seized, they were tried, and some of them condemned, until the annoyance became so great that in 1854 we purchased a cessation of these annoyances by commercial reciprocity with Canada.

When that reciprocity treaty expired, the same restrictions were enforced and the same regulations were put into effect, the same annoyances were carried out against American vessels, until again, in 1871, we purchased a cessation of them with actual cash.

When the treaty of 1854 was made there was no one here to denounce it as a base and cowardly surrender, but every one approved it. When the treaty of 1871 was made there were none here to denounce it as a base and cowardly surrender, but it met also with almost universal approval. Well, the precedent was thus established that the proper way to obtain relief from the harsh features of the treaty of 1818 was by other treaties modifying or suspending them.

When, therefore, the treaty of 1871 expired by limitation and by notice given, there were three courses open to the present Administration of the United States Government. In the first place, the course left open was to resort to negotiation, as precedent had established, for the purpose of quieting the disturbances that arose by enforcing Canadian restrictions under the treaty of 1818. The next course was retaliation, and the last course open to the Administration was an open act of war. Naturally, patriotically, and sensibly the Administration chose the ordinary humane and civilized method of negotiation, and this treaty is the result of that effort on the part of the Administration to continue the benefits of the treaties of 1854 and 1871 to the people of the United States and especially to the fishermen of our northeastern country. Every consideration of policy and humanity alike suggested it, and though the act of 1887 authorized the President in his discretion to resort to retaliation acts, he was not forbidden nor advised not to try negotiation, nor had Congress any right to forbid the exercise of his constitutional power to make treaties.

Well, now, why this sudden heat, when this Administration has but followed in the footsteps of its predecessors; when it has but followed in the path dictated by humanity and statesmanship and common Christianity, in trying to mitigate the evils of a harsh treaty by negotiation so as to prevent the country getting into a state of war, or of disquietude at least on the verge of war? Such a state would have cost millions and millions of dollars to the people of both countries. Why this sudden heat? Why this fierce assault upon this treaty, which is no more a base surrender, which is no more guilty of surrendering American honor and American rights than its predecessors? In the language of a distinguished American philosopher and man of letters—a man of more letters than proper spelling requires, Mr. Artemus Ward—"Why this thusness?" Why this patriotic indignation?

Mr. President, I will tell you why, as it strikes a plain man. A fellow in my country was caught once with an extra jack in his sleeve when playing a game of old sledge, and in response to the fierce denunciation of his adversary, he said, "Bill, you know we were 6 and 6, and it was your deal; I was obliged to do something." The situation is just that with the Republican party in regard to this treaty. The Presidential election is coming on, and the Republican party which desires once more to get into power and yearns after the flesh pots of Egypt as its chief joy, finds that the game is about 6 and 6, and that it is Grover's deal, and "they are just obliged to do something." That something has been very remarkable indeed. For about a hundred years, I believe, without an exception, an unbroken precedent, treaties with foreign countries were considered in executive or secret session, and our adversaries and the world at large were not taken into our councils. The reason for this was obvious. In fact, this discussion illustrates in an overwhelming manner the wisdom of our fathers in establishing executive sessions for the consideration of treaties.

How our poor vulgar boasting and how the disclosure of our mercenary motives and the exhibition of our prejudices and our bitterness against other peoples in the presence of the world is going to elevate us in the eyes of the nations or assist us in making treaties with them, is something that is beyond me. Yet this is what we have done. Like the French king, Louis XIV, we have invited the public to stand in our bed chamber and witness our morning ablutions and the making of our toilets.

Aware of all the reasons for observing this unbroken usage, our friends on the other side of the Chamber early in these proceedings resolved with almost entire unanimity that this treaty, like all other treaties, should be considered in executive session. But, sir, the game was 6 and 6, and they were compelled to do something, and all at once it seemed as they were journeying towards the Damascus of their hopes a great light shone round about them, and a voice was heard. Now, Mr. President, let me not be considered irreverent.

I do not intimate that either the voice or the light was from heaven—far from it. I should rather suppose them to have come from the antipodes of that blissful region. But, at all events, when that light shone round about these Senators and that voice was heard, like the apostle, they were not disobedient to the sheolic vision; and that voice said, "Republicans, why will ye not raise a row with Great Britain and get the Irish vote." [Laughter.] Whereupon the voice again said, "Get ye to a place called caucus"—not to a street called Straight, for they were already in a strait—but "get ye to a place called caucus, and there it shall be told ye what to do." And so they assembled in that upper chamber, and there the inspiration was again made manifest, and they were told that their only chance, the only avenue under heaven opened up whereby they might be saved, was to threaten war with Great Britain and bid for the Irish vote of this country and for the votes of all others whose prejudices against that country could be made available in the coming campaign. [Laughter.] That was the course adopted, and, sir, the conversion of those Senators under that vision or under the influence of that imperious party necessity was the most remarkable and pentecostal that has ever been known in American politics.

Many old, dignified, staid Senators, whose convictions in regard to the propriety of secret sessions for the consideration of treaties were so ingrained that it would have seemed impossible for any human consideration to have changed them, many of them without apology, without preface, merely upon a call of the yeas and nays, changed front so quick that the seat of that portion of the human raiment which can not be mentioned in public was actually left in front! They were as completely "reversed" as was ever Alexander McStinger, jr.

By this reversal of their solemn judgment, at the instance of a party necessity, we are made to present to the world this unusual spectacle of considering a treaty, not in a dignified way, not in a way respectful to the great power with whom we treat, not in a way considerate of the great interests of sixty millions of people for whom we treat, not in a way consistent with the dignity of a great and mighty nation which we represent, but we are considering it as if the issue was to be decided by a ward primary, and with about the same fairness and impartiality.

Mr. President, wherein does this treaty, which has been proposed to us by the Administration and which we have been invited to consider and ratify, deserve the denunciation and the abuse that have been heaped upon it? It is only necessary to compare it with the treaty of 1818 in order to show whether we derive any advantage from it. If we derive any advantage from it at all over the treaty of 1818, then, although we may not obtain all that we desire—and I do not think it is possible for human ingenuity to obtain all that some people desire under this treaty—yet if it be in any respect better for the American fisherman as he goes upon his wild and solitary voyage amid the dangers of the great deep and encounters the perils of the great banks; if he is placed in any better position whatever, if his safety is in any way increased, if his profits and conveniences are in any way bettered, then this treaty should receive the approval of the Senate, as, I have no doubt, it will be gratefully received by the whole American people.

In 1886, upon the termination of the treaty of 1871, a committee of the Senate was appointed to investigate all matters connected with the complaints of our fishermen, and the result of that investigation is that to which I desire to call your attention. I will not trouble the Senate by reading the official report, but I desire to read the Senate what one of the most distinguished members of that committee said of the result of that testimony, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is also perhaps, from locality, more interested than any other Senator in the subject. I read from an interview held with the Senator from Maine in October, I believe it was, 1886, immediately after the Committee on Foreign Relations had closed the taking of testimony in relation to the fisheries question, and here is what he said:

The testimony of the owners and fishermen taken at Gloucester, also at Boston, Provincetown, and Portland, was entirely agreed on the following points:
First. That there is no necessity at all for our fishing vessels to enter ports of Canada for any purposes except those provided for in the treaty of 1818, namely, for shelter, wood, water, and repairs.

No necessity at all for them to enter for any other purpose but those.

That while the Canadians admit our right to these privileges, they are unnecessarily and without excuse interfering continuously with our enjoyment of them. If one of our vessels runs into a Canadian port in a storm for shelter, they insist upon immediate entry—

There is one complaint referred to, the first one—no matter how inconvenient it may be to the captain of the vessel.

This treaty avoids that and says they need not enter for twenty-four hours. So there is one thing in which the present treaty is better than the treaty of 1818.

They will not permit him to land a man, though he be a citizen of that country, send his clothing ashore, send for treatment in sickness, purchase anything whatever.

There are four more serious complaints against the restrictions and regulations imposed by the Canadians upon our fishermen under the treaty of 1818, every one of which is removed by the present treaty, for a fisherman may send ashore; he may obtain doctors' attendance and medicines in sickness; he may buy whatever he needs for the repair of his vessel and for the comfort of his crew, and he may even enlist crews, if he wants to, in case of sickness. There is so obvious and so patent an improvement upon the old treaty that it seems to me the man who would deny that it was any improvement upon the old treaty would be making a statement broad enough for us to fish in, for it would be certainly over ten miles wide.

A score of our fishing vessels—

Says the Senator from Maine in this interview—

have already been seized by them and fined $400, for what they determined to be infractions of the peculiar rules and regulations of their customs laws, which have been obsolete for more than forty years. In fact, they do not permit us to enjoy any of the rights which they admit to be secured to us by the treaty of 1818, without putting us to more inconvenience and trouble than the right is worth.
Second. They refuse our fishermen absolutely and unqualifiedly all commercial rights whatever, and refuse to recognize as valid our customs permits to touch and trade.

Well, Mr. President, this treaty does not give our fishermen all commercial rights, but it gives them all the commercial rights that they need and more than they need according to the Senator, for, according to his declaration made in this interview, American fishermen have no necessity whatever to enter any port, except for shelter against storms, for wood, for water, and for repairs. The present treaty gives them commercial rights to the extent of allowing them to buy "all casual and needful supplies," such as are granted to trading vessels. So a great part of that complaint, at least, is removed by the present treaty.

And as to the complaint that the Canadian Government does not recognize our permits to our fishing vessels to touch and trade, I suppose of course that no Senator makes it with any seriousness. Surely he would not maintain that a treaty could be repealed in that way! How can the United States Government evade the solemn words of a treaty by simply investing a fishing vessel against which the treaty is made with the double character of a fisherman and a trader at the same time?

Mr. President, it seems to me that a proposition of that kind is unworthy of the United States Government. A solemn treaty is made with Great Britain in reference to the American fishermen that frequent and occupy for the purposes of fishing those great waters there, which are within the territorial dominion of the Government of Canada, and where that treaty says that fishing vessels shall not have certain commercial rights, shall not be permitted to enter into port at all except for the mere purpose of humanity, mentioned in the treaty itself; and it is seriously proposed that the Government of the United States should undertake to avoid that treaty or evade its force by so simple an operation as just investing the vessel with a character that she did not have. Now, can it be regarded as anything else than a fraud upon the nation with whom we had made the treaty? I say it is one that does not do the Government of the United States any honor by the suggestion.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator know that that provision which authorized permits to touch and trade was older than the treaty itself of which he is talking?

Mr. VANCE. That does not prove anything. If it was older, I suppose the subsequent treaty would repeal the older provision.

Mr. FRYE. It was not made, then, in order to defraud the Canadians.

Mr. VANCE. Perhaps that was not its original intention, the Canadian treaty not being in existence when it was made, but certainly the application of it afterwards in the face of the treaty could only be looked upon as an effort to defraud the Government of Great Britain, with whom we had made that treaty stipulation. That treaty having been made after that custom was in existence, it would seem to have been intended to repeal the custom. Otherwise that provision of the treaty was senseless. But I am referring to the interview with the Senator. He continues:

The fishermen also concur in saying that these commercial privileges are of no value. It has been generally understood that the right to purchase bait was a very valuable one; but the testimony not only shows that it is of no value, but the preponderance of testimony is that the right exercised does more harm than good; that the time consumed in going into and out of the port, and going thence to the banks again, costs the fisherman more than the value of the bait.

That being so, that these commercial rights are of no value, then it follows that the position of those Senators who take the ground that we must have commercial rights if we have to resort to retaliation and possibly war to obtain them is that the more worthless a right is the stronger we must contend for it; the greater the risk of bloodshed and war and all its desolation we are justified in incurring in order to obtain it. It is not because these commercial rights are worth anything to us, but, in the language of litigants in the lower courts, "because we do not intend to be run over."

Again he says:

Third. Both fishermen and owners agree with great unanimity that they require absolutely nothing of Canada other than the treaty rights of 1818.

They require nothing of Canada other than the naked rights of the treaty of 1818, that is, the privilege to go into port to obtain shelter, wood, water, and repairs. They, the owners of the vessels and the fishermen who manage them, the only real parties interested, say this; they say it under oath to a committee of this Senate. If they do not know what they want who does know? There are no commercial rights granted by the treaty of 1818, no right to enlist seamen, or obtain medical aid in case of sickness, nor any kind of supplies except wood and water. Yet, though they swore they did not want them, they get all in the present treaty. How, then, is the treaty a surrender of their rights? How are they injured? Wherein are they not substantially benefited?

And what is all this contention about? If our fishermen get all they require in the naked, unmodified treaty, and many more valuable concessions by the present modifications, in the name of justice and reason what is all this fuss about? Why do the heathen rage and desire the people to imagine a vain thing? Why is the peace and prosperity of our great country endangered, when our fishermen have got all they said they wanted, and which is worth nothing when they have got it?

That it is better for them—

Says the Senator—

That it is better for them when they start on their cruises to provide their vessels with everything that is necessary for the cruises, bait and all, than to leave anything to be provided for in Canada.
Fourth. They agree that the privilege of fishing inside of the 3-mile limit is absolutely worthless, and has been for fifteen years; that nearly all the fish, both mackerel and cod, have been taken outside; that fishing with purse-seines within 3 miles of the shores never brings compensation enough to make up for the damage to the seines in the shoal water and on the rocks.
Fifth. There seems to be no difference in opinion about the result of a treaty with Canada which would give them our markets or alter our tariff by making fish free. They believe it would be certain to destroy in ten or fifteen years the fishing industry of New England and transfer to Canada the fishing fleet; that there is nothing which Canada can give them as a compensation for this.

That the admission of Canadian fish into our markets free of duty would transfer the fishing fleet to Canada in a few years I think is likely. There is nothing more natural than that the Canadian fishermen who now pose as American seamen in the New England fleets should return home whenever it became their interest to do so. In short, the complaint is that if we do not keep the duty up the foreigners will leave us and we will be obliged to employ high-priced American labor.

Now, like a wise physician when he has diagnosed a case, the Senator from Maine prescribes the remedy, and here it is:

Sixth. Their remedy for existing troubles with their business is a higher duty on salt fish, also a duty on fresh fish.

Whenever you scratch a Russian they say you will find a Tartar. A wise man once, when hearing of some great tragedy, at once asked, "What was the woman's name?" So we might ask here as a solution of this whole question, how much per cent. will satisfy you; how much duty on fresh fish; how much higher do you want it on salt fish? Then the treaty will be adopted or anything else will be done.

Mr. President, there are some offenses against the dignity of man and of nations that can be assessed and paid for in money. There are some that can not. You heard the Senator from Maine describing the other day in words that burn, notwithstanding the heat of the day and the moisture of the speaker and of all who heard him, the tearing down of the American flag by a Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cruiser Terror, and you saw him advance to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE], shaking his fist in his face, and saying that he was apologizing for a man who tore down his country's flag. You heard all that. It created quite a ruffle in the galleries. I was somewhat thrilled myself. I thought I could already hear the shouts of the columns marching and see the banners stirring in the breeze, and smell the powder that was being burned to avenge that insult to the American flag. But alas, alas! the wounded honor of that Senator was of the commercial sort. It could be assessed and solved in cash. Vulgar traffic could apply the salve to wounded honor. Give him a little higher duty on salt fish and a duty on fresh fish and the insulted flag might wait for a more convenient season.

All of the eloquence upon that subject must therefore be understood in a Pickwickian sense. It all must be understood as what the lawyers term "matter of inducement;" that is, in order to make the British Government content to pay higher duties, if possible. These increased profits for the fish monopolist will heal our wounded honor and enable us once more to look the nations in the face without shame. What a blessed thing is national honor, which can be maintained in conjunction with thrift by simply increasing the cost of the poor man's fish!

Now, Mr. President, what shall we go to war for? What shall we run the risk of war for? What reason would we give to plain people? Not only is this treaty to be rejected, but we have been informed that the time for any and all treaties has passed by; we want nothing more of negotiation. Well, if we want nothing more in the shape of treaties and modifications of existing treaties, and still want commercial rights for our fishermen, and still desire the right to transship fish in bond, and ship them through Canadian territory into American markets, and still want this, that, and the other, and we are to resort to retaliation, which is very likely at least, to lead to war, what is it all for? The Senator has told us that these commercial rights are worth nothing; that the inshore fishing is worth nothing; that the privilege of purchasing bait and ice is worth nothing; that all these things are a loss to men who go into Canadian ports and are compelled to make a longer and more difficult voyage on that account—they are all worth nothing. Well, then, are we to fight England simply because we have a treaty with her that we do not like? Are we to fight England simply because she has made restrictions and regulations that are disagreeable to our fishermen? We have submitted to that for seventy years. The treaty is now seventy years old, and we have never had any let up on those Canadian restrictions, except when we purchased the let up either by cash or by reciprocal commercial regulations.

If we have stood by the naked severity of the treaty of 1818 and the regulations of Canada under the authority of that treaty for seventy years, can we not manage, do you not think, Mr. President, to endure it until the election is over? It seems to me that for the sake of peace, if we do as Mrs. Dombey was advised to do, "just make an effort," we might worry along until after November.

It is said that numbers of outrages have been perpetrated under these Canadian restrictions, and it is taken for granted that every doubtful case is an outrage. If a vessel is boarded it is an outrage; if a vessel is warned off it is an outrage; if a vessel is seized and taken into port it is an outrage; and if it is condemned and its owner and crew found guilty under the law it is an outrage, of course, and if it is acquitted and discharged it is an outrage. Every time Canadian authority lays a finger upon one of our fishermen, it does not matter what the fisherman is doing or how much he may be violating treaties and existing laws, every time that a finger is laid upon him it is an outrage.

I do not doubt, I do not pretend to say but that many high-handed outrages sure enough have been perpetrated upon our fishermen in those waters. The truth of the matter is, it seems to me, the pretensions of our countrymen are a little bit unreasonable. Consider the condition of those people of Nova Scotia and Newfoundand, living in the poorest, the bleakest, and most sterile country on the globe, with little to support them except the profits of those fisheries; and that the treaties which their country has formed with ours have given to our people the common right of fishing with them in all except a few restricted places; and yet, not satisfied with that, our fishermen insist upon making Nova Scotia and Canada and Newfoundland the base of their operations. They want to go into their ports and use them just as the Canadians use them; they want to buy all the supplies that are there to be had just as the Canadians buy them; they want to enlist Canadian crews.

They want the right to transship their fish in bond into American markets just as Canadians can not do, because of tariff duties. In other words, they want equal advantages upon the seas where the fish are caught, and they want equal privileges with their rivals and competitors in business on the land and within their jurisdiction, and yet want the Canadians excluded from our country by high protective duties. They say to them, give us freely all of your advantages for catching fish, but you can have none of ours for selling them unless you pay for them. I think that is hardly fair. So they are astute to find the means of confining the American fishermen exclusively to their rights under the treaty of 1818; and I say in that respect they are right. There is not a citizen of the United States, especially of New England, who would not do the same precisely if the conditions were reversed, except that our people would be still more astute. They would find a hundred methods of repelling Canadian fishermen from trespassing on their rights where the Canadians find one for repelling them from trespassing upon their rights.

In the interview which I have read the Senator from Maine told us that the commercial rights were worth nothing to the fishermen, but on the contrary were a positive disadvantage for the reasons which he gave; but in his speech the other day in the opening of this discussion he told us that we were ruined and the whole treaty was a failure because we did not get these commercial rights which he had before said were worthless.

Mr. President, when were we ever entitled to commercial rights for our fishermen in the ports of Canada? Mind you, a right implies something that can not be denied, and does not depend on the favor of the other party; a privilege or a liberty implies something that may be granted or may be denied, as the other side may determine; and in so much as all the rights in the fisheries that we ever had after the disruption of the British Empire and the establishment of our independence arose under the treaty of 1783, and that treaty was considered and confessed to be abrogated by the formation of the treaty of 1818, therefore all the rights of any kind that we had in Canadian ports for our fishermen depend upon that treaty of 1818, and there are no commercial rights there, but there are some commercial rights granted by this present treaty, as I have undertaken to explain.

The Committee on Foreign Relations say these commercial rights that were granted were by the arrangement of 1830.

I think any Senator who either heard or read the speeches of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] will be compelled to abandon that contention. It would be a little strange indeed if we were so entitled to commercial rights between 1830 and 1886 that in all these seizures of our vessels for the attempted exercise of commercial rights in Canadian ports, every one of them, one after another, had been made and conducted to a judgment one way or the other, not a single, solitary claim was ever put up by the defendant in any case that he was entitled to commercial rights under the arrangement of 1830. But such, as I am informed, is the historical fact. No man ever contended at any time for such rights and undertook to justify his action upon them. Therefore, however worthless those commercial rights may be, and therefore however desirable, we did not get them under the treaty of 1818, we did not get them under the arrangement of 1830, and we never have had them except under the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871, which treaties we terminated by our own motion.

As to the right to transship fish in bond, I presume that has been abandoned, at least by the Senator from Maine, for he tells us that in 1885, after the expiration of the notice which was given to terminate the treaty of 1871, all treaties whatsoever with reference to our northern fisheries were abrogated, and we were remitted alone to the operations of the treaty of 1818. So Article XXIX of the treaty of 1871 must have been abrogated, or else it must have never, in his opinion, contained the right of Americans to transship their fish in bond. At all events it was abandoned and disclaimed by our representative on the Halifax Commission, as has been shown here again and again.

But there is an attempt to argue this question from a patriotic side. I have never known a raid upon the Treasury or people of this country since I have been acquainted with the proceedings of Congress that was not based either upon the ground of patriotism or the good of the workingman, one or the other, and I venture to say so long as I remain a member of this body there will never be a proposition of that kind that is not so based. There seems in the estimation of some Senators to be no patriotism that is not subsidized.

They say this is a school of American seamen, a nursery for American seamen, and we are told with truth, and I take as great pride in it as though I lived in that northeast country and depended upon fish and potatoes alone for my living, that these seamen in the great naval wars which we have had covered their flag with glory and are one of the chief bulwarks of their country's defense. That is true, and whenever there is an American fisherman now following his honorable and perilous occupation upon the Grand Banks, on those tempestuous seas, I follow him with all my heart, and I honor him for all the perils which he so bravely faces; but to say that it is a nursery of American seamen is not the truth by more than half. It is a nursery of Canadian seamen for the greater part—that is what it is—under the American flag, and the same old mouldy chestnut that we hear in this Chamber from day to day and from month to month and from year to year that such and such taxes are necessary for the protection of American labor is here made to do duty again in behalf of the American seamen, meaning the ship-owners and fish monopolists of New England. Only this and nothing more. These vessels ship more than 50 per cent. of foreigners.

Notwithstanding the modest disclaimer of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] that he was not quite sure there was 50 per cent., I am satisfied that a large percentage over that of these seamen are Canadians, who go down from Nova Scotia and Newfoundland and other ports in Canada upon contract with the vessel-owners of Gloucester, Wellfleet, Portland, and Portsmouth, and other places in the fishing ports in New England, take service with them, many of them commanding the ships themselves, and run up the American flag and gather the fish and bring them in, not subject to any duty by reason of that flag, and put them upon the American market.

We are told now that rather than let any more free fish come into this market, and rather than continue the present moderate duty on salt fish, we must actually run the risk of war and run these two great nations into hostilities, with all which that means, these two greatest nations of modern civilization, the twain that lead the column of civilized humanity all over the world, in order to protect that nursery of American seamen, constituted principally of Canadian fishermen, British subjects!

Mr. President, perhaps I had better give you some authorities on that subject, not take my own assertion, not take the assertion of any one outside of that country, for the impression is made here that nobody knows anything about these fisheries except those people who live up there, and, in fact, none of those who live up there know anything about them except the members of the Republican party who are in favor of a high protective tariff for the benefit of American workmen. The Hon. Mr. Putnam, one of the commissoners, a native of New England, a great lawyer, a man of distinction, and acquainted with fishery matters from his youth upward, unfortunately happens to be a Democrat, and therefore can not know anything about the fisheries or what the fishermen want! We were twitted with that fact again and again, until I thought what a pity that Mr. George Steel and Mr. Luther Maddox, the presidents of these fisheries associations, had not been intrusted with the making of these treaties, and what a shame it was to permit the country at large to have anything to do with their own treaties with foreign nations! So I will give you some extracts from the leading newspapers of New England in relation to the character of the crews of these fishing vessels. I ask the Secretary to read an article taken from correspondence of the Boston Post, dated March 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

GLOUCESTER FISHERMEN DO NOT LIKE THE IDEA OF BEING SUPPLEMENTED BY NOVA SCOTIANS.

[Special.]

GLOUCESTER, March 22.

The exposure of the gigantic halibut monopoly has been the common conversation among the fishermen on the street corners, around the wharves, and on board the vessels, wherever one may chance to go. "Well," said the spokesman of a crowd of men who were on Parkhurst's wharf, "the Post and Herald deserve credit for the enterprising spirit they have shown in giving the public some light on this halibut pool, and how it has been using the fishermen." "But," interrupted another, "there are other things which want to be shown up which are of vast importance to the fishermen. One is the importing of men from the provinces to man the vessels. That is the worst outrage that has been committed upon the rights of the American fishermen."

The reporter, out of curiosity, perambulated the wharves to see what knowledge could be gained. With the aid of two ex-skippers, who volunteered their services, nearly every wharf was visited, and it was found that the large fleet of vessels which have been hauled up all winter were being rapidly fitted out for the various fishing-grounds. The first part of the season there was some difficulty in procuring crews to man the early fleet for Georges and Western Bank. Since the 1st of March a large number of men have arrived here to engage in fishing from this port, principally from Pubnico and Argyle, Nova Scotia. These men are expert fishermen and can be hired cheaper than Americans, consequently their services are eagerly sought, and they are shipped in preference to the men who live here and have families to maintain.

Among the fleet fitting out, wholly commanded and manned by provincial crews, are the schooners William H. Jordon, Fernwood, John W. Bray, Marguerite, Epes Tan, Mist, Nellie N. Davis, Druid, Margaret Mather, Plymouth Rock, Wildfire, and others too numerous to mention. The owners here who so strenuously cry for protection, by excluding Canadian fish from the markets of the United States, throw their arms wide open and hail with great joy the advent of those men, whom they want to man their vessels and whom they could not get along without. Now, the way those men are shipped and the method that the owners are adopting are worthy of note. After the season is over a large majority of the vessels are hauled up, with the exception of those which go halibuting, haddocking, and to Newfoundland.

The crews in most cases are Nova Scotians, and when the season is over they return to their provincial homes, taking what money they have earned with them and spending it there. But before leaving, they are engaged for the next season; and about the 1st of March they put in their appearance, the masters who live there coming with them. On their arrival here they go on board, when the vessel is used for a boarding-house, they in most every case buying their own food. They take out ballast or put it in, as the case may require; put in salt; put the vessel on the railway and clean her, and, in fact, every conceivable thing is done to make her ready for the voyage. Now, this is what our men are claiming is an injustice on the part of the owners; for the men who brave the storms of winter are often turned on shore to make room for the imported foreigners. This work once was all done by the fishermen and 'longshoremen who live here and who have families to support, receiving a considerable sum during the season.

Said a group of excited fishermen and lumpers who stood on the Atlantic wharf and saw the British schooner On Time haul in and land sixty men just from Liverpool, Nova Scotia, who had been engaged the season before to come here, among them being several who were going as masters: "This is what the owners call protecting the fishermen—importing foreign labor. Is not what they have been preaching a farce?" "Well," said John F. Cunen, "it is time this was shown up. Our local papers will not say anything about it for fear they would insult some selfish owner who is trying to get up a fishing trust. The Boston papers should have a true statement of these facts and expose this as well as the halibut pool." "What a pity the investigating committee of the Senate was not here now," shouted out another. "They could see if what was told them two years ago was true—that there were but a few Nova Scotians going fishing from here."

The American fishermen here say they do not blame the men for coming, but they blame the owners for importing foreign labor; and it is the general opinion that if the men are coming here fish should be admitted free and make it cheaper to the consumer, for the price is such that it is almost impossible for a poor man to buy it. Fishermen say they do not make as much as when there was free fish. And there is not so much money among the laboring class as there was in former years. It is the opinion of all the fishermen and laboring men that they are being treated unjustly by the men who shout for protection by excluding Canadian fish from the markets of the United States. Two years ago the testimony was given by those same ardent advocates of protection that they wanted nothing from Canada and it was detrimental to the fishermen to go there. At the same time they were importing provincial crews at wholesale, and in many cases paying their passages here and feeding them on board the vessels for a number of days while getting ready for the voyage—something they would not do for the men here.

In looking over the testimony given in this city before the subcommittee of the United States Senate, Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submits his report, and in that document will be found (January 19, 1887, No. 1683) the evidence of several parties from this city interested in the fishing business; and on page 140 is the testimony of Capt. John Chisholm, who says, in answer to questions by Senator EDMUNDS, that he had four Nova Scotians on board his vessel, and he had engaged them to come here, sending them money to pay their passage. [Is this not importing foreign labor, and what other men in various parts of the country have been prohibited from doing? Others testified that not more than 1 per cent. of the Gloucester fishermen were foreign born and but few were provincial.

The statement of things to-day is in contradiction to that story, for a large majority of the vessels are manned by Nova Scotians, and a talk with them will reveal the fact that they are the most loyal of British citizens, and not a trained reserve for the American Navy, whom the United States can rely on in time of war, as Capt. Fitz J. Babson and other ardent advocates of a Chinese war policy are endeavoring to make people believe. Some of these alleged American fishermen jumped to arms when a call was made for men to help to put down the Riel insurrection in the Northwest. Our fishermen need protection, but not in the way they are receiving it at the hands of a few selfish fishing owners, who are trying to keep them from getting a living by engaging men six months in advance to come from the provinces to man their vessels.

Mr. VANCE. I also ask the Secretary to please read another article from the Boston Post of April 30, 1888.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"We are delighted to learn that President Cleveland has instructed the United States district attorney to proceed against the owners and masters of fishing vessels who have violated the law by importing labor for use on their craft.

"In view of our tabular statement, what becomes of the assertion of a contemporary that it would be impossible for any unofficial person to obtain the figures presented by the Boston Post? At all events our figures do not lie. They are veritable fact. The figures of our tabular statement show that nearly one-half of the crews of our Cape Cod fishing fleets are not Americans, but foreigners."

In connection with the above statement from the Barnstable County Journal, the following extracts from a circular issued by the Boston fish bureau, as the result of a series of interviews on this subject, are of interest. A Gloucester captain stated:

"There are probably one thousand that come every year from the western part of Nova Scotia and go right through the suburbs of Boston every spring and go back in the fall, and the State don't know that they are there at all. I have at my house from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty of these transient boarders every year who wait for the vessels to get ready. The Canadian fishermen all have small places of their own and raise potatoes and turnips for their families. The boys or wife will put them into the ground in the spring. Our smartest fishermen come from the provinces, and the best captains. Of those that come in March and April, ninety out of one hundred go back."

A member of a prominent Boston firm dealing extensively in fish was interviewed by the bureau. He said, speaking of a Provincetown vessel-owner:

"He sends out seven or eight vessels to the Banks. His vessels will probably contain four or five Americans. First, he will write his captain in Nova Scotia and will ask for enough men to make up the crew, perhaps fifteen or sixteen, and will pay them from $150 to $200 for the season, or else it may be arranged that they will go on a lay. It is understood that the Provincetown lay is 40 per cent. of the profits for the crew and 60 per cent. for the owners. His Nova Scotia captain will write back he has engaged the men and will meet the vessel at some port in Nova Scotia at a certain date, or, if the owner desires, he will bring the men here on the receipt of the money to pay their passage. Every year Wellfleet vessels wait at our wharf for Canadian crews. The crews do not average 25 per cent. Americans. Quite awhile ago it was always the custom to sign articles, but to-day it is not so much done, because the captains prefer not to, so they can discharge their crew when they please at any time. The Canadian fishermen principally come from Yarmouth, Pubnico, Liverpool, Shelburne, and Cape Negro, in Nova Scotia and their precincts. I had eleven citizens of the United States in a total of fifty-four last year."

As was shown at the time of the apprehension of provincial laborers imported under contract recently, it is not vessel-owners alone who have been violators of the law. Farmers and others have taken advantage of the willingness of the Canadian laborer to work at a lower rate than the native, and have contracted for and imported them to a considerable extent. It is stated that at the present time from twelve to twenty such cases are known of in the vicinity of Newburyport, and that prompt action will be taken.

Mr. VANCE. I will myself read an extract from the Boston Herald of March 12, 1888:

Arrived, schooners Brunhilda and James A. Garfield, from Grand Banks; Ethel Veanie, M. Getchell, Marion Grimes, Midnight, F. R. Walker, Sterling, Maud M. Story, Martha and Susan, A. R. Crittenden, and M. H. Perkins, from Georges; Blue Jay, from Grand Manan; Herman Babson, from New York; Nora Castle, from Salem; Enola C, from Boston; Rattler, Lizzie, Henrietta, Edward Trevoy, Mascot, and E. P. Boynton, from haddocking; H. A. Duncan, Star of the East, from Ipswich Bay, and Robert J. Edwards, from Fortune Bay, being the last of the Newfoundland frozen-herring fleet. Schooner Uncle Sam arrived to-day from Pubnico, N. S., bringing one hundred men to engage in fishing from this port, among them being several who will command vessels from here. Men of late have been quite scarce, it being with some difficulty that crews could be secured, and the services of these men are eagerly sought after.

The Boston Post is Democratic; the Boston Herald is Independent. I want to read now an extract from the Boston Transcript, which is undoubtedly Republican, old-fashioned Republican:

The Gloucester fish dealers, who are also the owners of the Gloucester fishing fleet, have succeeded in getting up quite a corner in the fish market. Although they are a local close corporation they are inclined to pose as a national casus belli. The chances which they offer to fishermen are so small that they can get practically no Americans to sail their boats and catch their fish, and have to depend on Canadian fishermen; but this circumstance does not prevent them from assuming that the United States Government is bound to do everything they ask, even to the extent of going to war for this spurious "American fisherman."

We have often pointed out that the fishermen in whose behalf so violent a claim is continually being made are anything but Americans, as a rule; and now it seems that even the provincial fishermen, since this latest "trust" was organized and the latest squeeze made upon the pay of the men who do the work, are declining to serve the syndicate. If the dealers in the trust should find difficulty in getting Canadians to work for them, it is hard to see where they could go next. Perhaps they can get Frenchmen at St. Pierre, and perhaps some Chinamen of piscatorial tendencies might be found to pose as the sturdy "American fisherman" in whose behalf our Government is to put itself in a state of immediate readiness to go to war. It is time that this mockery was over, and that, politics and clap-trap apart, a definite and business-like arrangement of the matter with Canada, satisfactory to the mass of our people, were consummated.—Boston Transcript (Republican).

I should also ask, Mr. President, on this subject to file a schedule of vessels arriving and departing from Gloucester, taken from the Boston Post of April 16, 1888. As the list is a long and tedious one I will ask to file it as a part of my remarks bearing upon this subject, showing the nationality of the crews of those vessels.

The paper is as follows:

[Boston Post, April 16, 1888. Special from Gloucester, April 15.]

GLOUCESTER'S SEAMEN.

The following list of Gloucester vessel owners, together with the number of vessels owned and foreign fishermen employed by each firm, has been compiled for the Post by gentlemen thoroughly conversant with the existing status of the fishing industry at this port. The number of foreign employés is necessarily arrived at by estimation, as no exact figures bearing upon this subject exist. In estimating, the results are based upon crews of these vessels during the last three years. The statement is believed to be rather an under than an over estimate:

Robert Torrey, of East Point, Prince Edward Island, fell overboard, September, 13, 1887.

The "List of Vessels Belonging to the District of Gloucester," published by Proctor Bros., of this city, contains a statement in detail of the loss of life from Gloucester in 1887. This statement shows that by wreck, capsizing of boat, or other disaster, 121 Gloucester fishermen perished. Of this number 101 were foreigners and 20 were American or of unknown nationality.

As a result of the action of Collector Saltonstall, the Halifax Chronicle, of April 20, publishes a dispatch from Yarmouth, N. S., stating that the steamer Yarmouth had arrived with eighteen fishermen who were not permitted to land in Boston. The dispatch further states:

"Most of these men really were going over under an agreement to work on 'shares,' and it is very doubtful whether there was any violation of the law in contracts of that nature. They were not hired laborers, but partners in fishing speculations. * * * It would be well in future for fishermen to enter into no contracts until they arrive in the United States. The effect of the action of the Boston authorities will be to seriously cripple the New England fishing industry, as fishermen can not be obtained there."

Several of the men returned to Nova Scotia on the Yarmouth are stated to be now in the United States fulfilling their contracts, having returned to this country under assumed names and with greater knowledge of the law.

At least 50 per cent., and I contend more, of the fishermen who compose these crews are unnaturalized foreigners, Canadians or others. Why do they do that? Why do they employ them? Why, sir, they employ them, according to the testimony of Mr. Putnam, or rather according to the testimony of one of the witnesses whom Mr. Putnam quotes, Mr. James Gifford, deputy collector at Provincetown, who testified before the committee, because the wages paid to British crews were from $75 to $82 per man, and those paid the American crews were from $125 to $190 per man. Therefore they employ these Canadians because they get them for about half price. Now, consider for a moment that a duty of 22 per cent. is levied on salt fish for the purpose of protecting the American fishermen from foreign cheap labor, whereupon the American fish owner immediately hires Canadian "foreign paupers" for about half-price to catch the fish for him; and if the maintenance of that arrangement results in a war, why here is a party of well-trained British-Canadian seamen to help fight that war—on the other side, of course. That is the proposition.

It is urged that Mr. Bayard in this treaty was outgeneraled by the trained English diplomatists. If the success of his venture in diplomacy is to be tested by a standard of this kind, I admit it was a very great failure, for I do not think there is any man living on the face of this earth but a genuine Down East Yankee who could practice that kind of a trick; get a duty of 22 per cent. to protect his fish and enable him to compete with Canadian "paupers," and then hire the paupers for half-price to catch the fish. If Mr. Bayard is to be tested by that as a diplomatist, he would go under.

But that is not the worst of it, Mr. President. With an air of great consideration for the interest of the people of this country and apparently for the purpose of avoiding any of the complications that might result from general retaliation and non-intercourse with Canada, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] proposes that the retaliatory measures to be adopted by the President shall be confined to fish alone. That would be a species of diplomacy that even exceeds the other to which I have just referred. As a matter of course, if we can get up a sufficient row with Canada to induce the President to forbid the bringing in of their fish at all, not bring them in on the payment of a duty, but to keep those miserable "foreign paupers" from bringing in any fish at all, what a glorious thing it would be for all the New England fish-pools—not the fish-pools which Solomon described and to which he compared the eyes of his love, "the fish-pools of Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-rabbim," but the fish-pools of halibut and of cod and of mackerel of Gloucester. Those are the fish-pools that would rejoice in this retaliation. It would keep their rivals out of business and out of the country and not permit them to bring anything in, not so much even as a sucker. Are there such pools? Are there such combinations to enhance the price of food and speculate at the expense of the hardy fishermen who face the dangers of the deep?

Again, let me resort to the testimony which is furnished by the country where these fisheries are located, "native and to the manner born." I ask the Secretary to read, omitting the parts marked out, from the Boston Weekly Post of March 16, 1888.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Boston Weekly Post, March 16, 1888.]

THE HALIBUT POOL—HOW THE TRADE IS CONTROLLED BY THE COMBINATION—FISHERMEN AND CONSUMERS ALMOST ENTIRELY AT ITS MERCY—ITS METHODS OF OVERCOMING COMPETITION.

Some of those gentlemen at Gloucester who have so strenuously opposed the fisheries treaty in the few weeks since its contents were made public have for a much greater length of time been themselves the objects of a stout opposition which, though undemonstrative, has been none the less earnest. While they have been raising an outcry against the alleged injustice of the treaty, clamoring for protection in no uncertain voice, they have themselves been engaged in a business which leaves fishermen and consumers alike unprotected and almost entirely at their mercy.

The halibut pool which has been so carefully fostered through half a score of years has had, under their dexterous treatment, so rapid a growth that it has now attained the proportions of a full-fledged monopoly, and is of such power that it easily controls a large portion of the eastern halibut trade. Scarcely a halibut is sold in Boston but has first passed through the hands of the combination, and Fulton Market in New York is thoroughly permeated with its influence. There, as on T wharf in Boston, the majority of wholesale halibut dealers are in close conjunction with the Gloucester pool, and are by their agreement bound to purchase their fish solely of the companies comprising the pool. These companies are three in number, namely, the New England Halibut Company, the most extensive of the trio; the Atlantic Halibut Company, composed of Mayor Robinson, of Gloucester, and Messrs. Gardner, Poole, and Parsons; and a third, controlled by Messrs. Stockbridge and Hodge, under the firm name of Stockbridge & Co. These companies have separate establishments at Gloucester, and each has its own list of dealers to whom sales are regularly made, yet the three are closely united, and there is no competition between them, nor profit to one at the expense of the others.

The New England is a stock company, and the dealers to whom it sells are stockholders and receive a share of the profits proportionate to the number of boxes of fish which they buy. The two other companies agree to pay to their dealers a bonus on every box purchased, varying in different instances from $2 to $8. The dealers on T wharf who have contracted with these companies receive generally a bonus of $4 per box. The dealers who purchase exclusively of the New England Halibut Company receive large yearly dividends, the rebate per box last year, it is said, amounting to almost $10. Of the long line of wholesale halibut dealers ranged along T wharf all but two, Conquest & Hodgkins and the Boston Fish Company, are connected with and bound to one or the other components of this interesting Gloucester trio, and so are indirectly members of the combination. Three on Commercial wharf are the only other halibut dealers in Boston who are independent of these restrictions and their hypothetically compensating advantages.

* * * * * * *

There seems to be one opinion as to the purpose of the combination, namely, that it is seeking to monopolize the halibut business, to the exclusion of all competitors. The greater number of the fishing vessels in use in Gloucester are owned by members of the combination, so that the shippers feel compelled to sell their fish to them at whatever price they offer, and the captains of most of the other ships, so it is stated, are pledged to sell their fish to the combination only. The independent companies in Gloucester are so small that it is impossible for them to fight successfully so powerful an opponent on its own ground. And yet small as they are, these independent dealers do much, by their competition, to raise the price of fish to the fisherman as well as to keep it down to the consumer. Dennet & Wonson is the largest of these independent firms. The others, whose competition amounts to very little, are the Cape Ann Fish Company, Grimes & Tarr, and J. C. Tarr & Co.

The cases are numerous and of frequent occurrence where the price first offered by the combination for a trip of halibut is, through the competition of Dennet & Wonson, increased 50 or even 75 per cent. Without the salutary influence of this competition the pool would contrive to keep prices at the lowest possible figure to the fisherman while keeping it up to the consumer. As an instance of this, one day last week the pool paid for the first trip in port 4 cents for gray and 5 for white, and sold them for 7 and 9. Four hours later Dennet & Wonson bid against them for the second trip and ran the price up to 6½ and 8½, at which price the pool finally bought them. But without this competition they would have sold for 4 and 5, the price first offered. About the same time Dennet & Wonson offered a skipper 4 and 6 for fish which he had been selling to the combination for 4 and 5, but the combination's price immediately came up to 4 and 6, and they were sold to them at that price.

Fishermen feel obliged to sell to the combination, but if they can get better prices elsewhere will generally take them. Yet they are frequently subjected to threats and told that if they sell to Dennet & Wonson they will lose the patronage of the combination. This is a threat of a serious nature, for though Dennet & Wonson are ready to buy one trip at a good price, their capital is not large enough to enable them to buy a big fleet of 60,000 or more pounds, and the pool is the only other available purchaser. Several instances are cited where a skipper has sold his shipload to Dennet & Wonson and then sold it over again upon receiving a better offer from the pool. It is further asserted that this combination has at times sold at 4 and 6 fish for which it paid 5 and 7, solely to impede its competitors and drive them out of the field, so as to secure a complete monopoly, for which the public will eventually bleed.

The pool offers a low price originally, but as soon as competition sets in it bids up and up to a point just beyond where it is known the smaller dealers will be enabled to buy. But it has gone further than to merely outbid and threaten in prices, and now it threatens the trade, informing the dealers, both wholesale and retail, that if they buy of Dennet & Wonson they can never buy of it. In order to buy at all Dennet & Wonson have to considerably outbid the pool. Last Friday, for instance, the pool was paying 5 and 7, while Dennet & Wonson paid 7 and 9; and on Saturday the pool paid 7 and 5, while its competitors had to pay 8½ and 6. If Dennet & Wonson offered only what was offered by the combination they could never purchase a fish. It is readily seen that the profits of the pool must be heavy, for if the smaller companies can make money by paying 7 and 9 the pool must make vastly more paying only 5 and 7. Half a cent per pound is considered a very good rate profit, but the pool earns easily 2 cents and often 4 per pound.

In addition to paying more, the smaller companies must charge less for their fish, since the wholesale dealers who get no rebate manifestly can not pay as much as those that do. Dennet & Wonson sell for 1 cent less per pound, while always paying at least 1 cent more than the companies in the combination, and yet they manage to make a pretty fair profit. The small competition which the combination meets is the only reason why it is forced to grant these rebates, and if Dennet & Wonson should to-morrow go out of business the rebates would cease to be paid, since the monopoly would be complete, and they would no longer be necessary.

In addition to the injury to competitors, the price to the consumer is enhanced, since the combination demands of the dealers to whom it sells whatever price it pleases, practically controlling the market. It sometimes buys a trip at 4 and 5 cents and sells it to the dealers at 8 and 9, thus making an exorbitant price for the consumer. In order to pay its agents and vessel-owners, as well as rebates to the wholesale dealers, it is necessary that the combination should make a large profit. In spite of the large rebates paid by the combination, there is often dissatisfaction among the dealers who receive them.

Last year a large New York dealer who had been in the combination for two years, purchasing from the Atlantic Halibut Company and receiving a dividend of $8 on every box bought, declared that he had to pay too much to the Atlantic Company, that he was losing trade and he was determined to get out of it. He is now doing a good business of his own, purchasing a large quantity of his halibut from Dennet & Wonson.

* * * * * * *

If there were anything but party politics in the opposition to the treaty it would be proper to ask whether Mr. FRYE thinks he really knows what the fishermen want, or that he knew in 1886.

Mr. VANCE. I will ask the Secretary to read one more extract from the Boston Herald, being a correspondent's letter dated Gloucester, July 18, 1888, in reference to the formation of a fish pool.

The Secretary read as follows:

A FISH TRUST—GLOUCESTER FIRMS COMBINE TO CONTROL THE PRICE AT THAT PORT.

[Special dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

GLOUCESTER, July 18, 1888.

About twenty of the leading fish firms met yesterday in a private conclave to fix a uniform scale of prices and arrange for the systematic control of the fishing business. The object of the meeting, it is said, was to take action against any outside competition. During the week the schooner Edgar S. Foster, of Beverly, arrived here from Grand Banks with a fare of 285,000 pounds, which was purchased by George Dennis, jr., a gentleman who owns no vessels, and whose business is principally done in the way of buying fish from outside vessels.

A number of the fish-owners wanted to purchase the Foster's fare at the prices agreed upon by the firms, which offer was declined by Captain Hines, and Mr. Dennis purchased the trip for $3 and $2.25 per hundredweight for large and small, which is the highest price paid here this season, and higher than the firms have been paying for Georges fish, which are considered the best in the market. It is alleged that the would-be syndicate felt somewhat sore over this matter, because the outside buyers stood in their way, and that they were unable to purchase these fish at their own prices, for a vessel owned by one of the firms arrived at the same time and did not get as high price as this outside vessel. As fish are scarce, and the probability is that there will be a small catch, the faction want to control the fish landed here.

A vessel which arrived from the Grand Banks yesterday, owned by one of the large firms, only received $2.62½ per hundredweight for her fish, while outsiders are paying considerably more. It is the general conversation among the fishermen that they are getting treated unjustly by those men who are crying for protection, while poor Jack before the mast has got to protect himself. This schooner, Edgar S. Foster, whose crew got the highest price paid this season here for bank fish, all belong and reside together with the captain at Pubnico, Nova Scotia, and neither pay a poll-tax nor contribute in any way to the welfare of this city, but take their money and return to their provincial homes, where they remain all winter, coming here in the early fishing season to take charge of vessels which have been commanded and manned during the rough weather in winter by Americans, who have to go on shore to make room for aliens.

The meeting yesterday was temporarily organized with Sylvanus Smith president, John L. Stanley secretary, and, after some discussion, James G. Tarr, Charles H. Pew, and Jeremiah Foster, with the president and secretary, were chosen a committee to report a constitution and by-laws and list of officers for a permanent organization. It is said that a scale of prices was fixed upon to govern the purchase of fares for the remainder of the year. How it will work against outside fish dealers will be watched with much interest.

Mr. VANCE. I will now ask to have read the resolutions of the Gloucester Knights of Labor in relation to these fish trusts, which satisfies me that there is at least one assemblage of laboring men in this country that understands the true inwardness and meaning of this thing called "protection to American labor." I ask that that be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THAT HALIBUT POOL—RESOLUTIONS OF A GLOUCESTER KNIGHTS OF LABOR ASSEMBLY.

GLOUCESTER, March 25.

[Special.]

Deep Sea Assembly 5066, Knights of Labor, of this city, has adopted the following self-explanatory resolutions:

"Whereas there exists and has existed for years in this city a fresh-halibut monopoly, which absolutely controls the halibut market, to the detriment of the fishermen and consumers; a monopoly whose methods depreciate the price paid to the toilers of the sea for their products and make the same an expensive luxury to the consumers; a monopoly so unrelentless in its avariciousness as to render it well-nigh impossible for any one outside of its circle to pursue the halibut business; and

"Whereas said halibut monopoly has flourished in the past with little or no publicity given to its mercenary movement by which the hardy fishermen have been deprived of a just share of the wealth they create; and

"Whereas the Boston Post and Boston Herald have in recent issues laid bare the schemes and methods of this stupendous 'fish trust' to which the public pay tribute: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the thanks of Deep Sea Assembly, No. 5066, Knights of Labor, be, and are hereby, extended to the Boston Post and Boston Herald for their timely exposition of the iniquitous system of said monopoly.

"Resolved, That it is the prayer of this assembly that the above-mentioned newspapers will continue their good work, for the field is large, and by running the plow of investigation thoroughly through it, abuses will be unearthed beside which the treatment of the fishermen by our Canadian neighbors will sink into utter insignificance.

"Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the records and copies be sent to the Boston Post and Boston Herald."

Mr. PANCE. That touches the key-note of the whole situation, as it seems to me, Mr. President. In my opinion the whole of this question of protection to American fishermen, as it is called, and all of this indignation against the treaty originate with the fish pools and the monopolists of the trade to whom these extracts refer, and it is all in their interest, while the true interest of the jack-tars, the common fellows who handle hook and line and the ropes and shrouds and expose themselves to the dangers and tempests of the great waters are not benefited, but, on the contrary, are cut under in their wages and ruined every day by this cheap Canadian labor that is imported in violation of law for the purpose of managing the ships of those owners of vessels. And the true secret of the ill success of this treaty arises from the fact that these men are compelled under the circumstances to have Canadian crews. If they get Canadian crews they must land in order to enlist them, and when the voyage is over and they have their fare of fish they have to land their crews at their homes, where they spend their money, and then the vessel returns with only one or two men and a boy to Massachusetts or the coast where they belong. And wherever these vessels undertake to land for this purpose they are snatched up under the treaty of 1818, under the regulations imposed by the Canadian Government in relation thereto, and they are fined, etc., and if you will look over the list of so-called outrages you will find a very large part of them were detained or seized for an attempt to ship or land crews, as the case may be.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], whom I do not see in his seat, gave us a long, labored, polished, cultivated, and eloquent speech on this treaty question. In fact, it was so dressed and polished that there was hardly anything left in it except glittering generalities. But he illustrates very well to me the proceedings of a very humble portion of the entomological world, called the June bug, whose movement when he rises is the very poetry of motion and whose song may well be described as the basis of natural melody, but whose alighting is always in the nature of an anti-climax.

After that Senator had quoted what the marquis of somebody had said, or Lord Bathurst, or Lord Aberdeen, or Mr. Webster, or John Adams, and taken us on a tour through the history of the negotiations for the last hundred years in relation to the treaties on this subject, and dealt with them in a masterly manner, he came down finally in his peroration to something he could not avoid, I suppose, if it had been necessary to save his life. He said:

I confess that, much meditating on these things, I take little satisfaction when I think of Grover Cleveland.

Mr. President, it is to be hoped that Grover Cleveland doeth the like, when he thinketh of the Senator from Massachusetts.

I do not like the policy which everywhere robs American citizenship of its glory. I do not like the methods of fraud and crime which have destroyed popular elections in so many Democratic States. I would have the box where the American freeman casts his ballot sacred as a sacramental vessel. I do not like this conspiracy between the old slaveholder and the English manufacturer, to strike down the wages of the American workman and the comfort of the workman's home. I do not like your refusal to maintain the American Navy and to fortify and defend the American coast. And I like no better the present treaty. It leaves the American sailor to be bullied and insulted without redress, and abandons the American right to the fisheries, older than the nation itself, which the valor of our fathers won for us and the wisdom of our fathers preserved for us.

By the treaty of 1818, for instance.

Now, Mr. President, nobody knows any better than that Senator that there is no conspiracy between the old American slaveholder and the English manufacturer. No man knows any better than that Senator that the great bulk of those who desire the tariff of this country to be reduced to the necessities of the Government are not and never were slaveholders. Nobody knows any better than that Senator that the reduction of the tariff to the necessities of the Government will not strike down the American workman's wages and strike down the comforts of his home. He knows that it is not true; but yet it is one of the necessities of the case. Plain, unadulterated, and unassuming facts will not do in a case of this kind; there must be some of the broad inferences of rhetoric, there must be some of the striking expressions of composition for which he and others from his part of the country are famous in order to produce the desired effect.

If true, and they are not true, what have these things to do with the ratification of this treaty? What is the necessity to talk about a man's being an old slaveholder simply because he wants to reduce the tariff of the Government to a scale that will meet its expenses and no more; and what has either to do with the consideration of the treaty? How much worse is the man who was an old slaveholder than the men who were old slave-traders? How much better are the men who were opposed to the abolition of the slave-trade and deferred it twenty years because their ships were engaged in it than the men who bought the slaves and owned them until they were freed? And what has either to do with the treaty? How much better is the man who traded for a slave in his native wilds and paid for him in rum than the man who bought him when launched upon this coast and treated him humanely and made him a Christian man?

Why should a direct political descendant of the Hartford convention, without a flaw in the lineage, stand up here and accuse Senators who argue in favor of this treaty of being on the "British side?" It seems to me that those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. It seems to me that men who represent the sentiment of the Hartford convention, which most traitorously did take the British side, should be a little bit modest in treating anybody else as being upon the British side because he argues according to his convictions on the proposed treaty with the British nation. It seems so to me; and yet a Senator goes out of his way in the peroration of his speech (the sting being in the tail of his remarks) to say that the old slave-trader and the British manufacturer are trying to strike down and degrade American labor and destroy the comforts of the American workingman's home.

Mr. President, the Senator who said that represents men who are degrading American labor every day and striking down the comforts of the American laborer's home every hour, by employing cheap Canadians for the purpose of operating in these fisheries to the exclusion of their own native countrymen. The people whom that Senator represents are degrading labor every day and striking down the comforts of the workingman's home by employing cheap Canadians in all their factories, and by employing cheap Canadians in the cutting of their lumber in the forests of Maine and bringing in foreign labor by contract in defiance of law.

That same Senator proposed to further degrade American labor by refusing by his vote to exclude the population of China, but proposed by his negative vote to let China flood this country with its cheap, half-civilized labor, and absolutely drown out all of the American labor and degrade the American laborer's home and reduce his wages. Moreover, the candidate of that Senator for the Presidency of these United States gave a vote side by side with the Senator from Massachusetts to permit that semi-barbarian empire to deluge this country with its cheap and half-civilized labor to the degradation of our native American or naturalized citizens.

Should not that Senator be a little bit modest when he thinks of those things? Could he not have closed his great speech without that assertion in the close of it, so unjust, so far from being true? It seems to me that he could, and that he ought to have done so. But necessity drives him also, as well as others.

The last speech which we had upon this subject was from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to interrupt him before he passes from that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like the Senator from North Carolina to state a little more definitely when it was, what date and on what bill it was, and what was the precise proposition under discussion and under vote, at the time to which he alludes, when he says the candidate of the Republican party for the Presidency cast a certain vote which, he says, was in the interests of Chinese immigration.

Mr. VANCE. I can not just from memory accommodate the Senator. I will turn to the record as soon as I get time.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg to suggest that no vote that gentleman cast at any time would justify the extreme remark made by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I will abide by the record.

I say the last speech we had upon this subject was made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I had hoped that he would give us a speech upon the merits of the treaty. I had hoped that he would confine himself to a fair discussion of the provisions of the treaty and a fair comparison of them with the provisions of the treaty which this treaty was intended to amend and supplement. But he did not. Towards the last of his speech he too felt the necessity of going outside of the record. He too felt it absolutely incumbent upon him to talk of anything else rather than the treaty before the Senate, and to appeal to anything else rather than to the argument which made for its support or its rejection.

The Senator from Colorado told us of the wrongs of Ireland with a positive wail and suggestion of tears in his voice, and the wickedness of the British Government, and then he turned dramatically over this way and told about a lot of Confederate brigadiers being seated over here as Senators, as if that had anything to do with the question before the Senate. Neither the wrongs of Ireland nor the wickedness of Great Britain nor the presence of Confederate brigadiers in the Senate has anything to do with the real merits of the question. Like "the flowers that bloom in the spring," they "have nothing to do with the case;" but still they furnish an opportunity perhaps for appealing to prejudice. They furnish an opportunity perhaps for an appeal to some Irishman for his vote in favor of their candidate for the Presidency, and that is the sole object of it.

We are reduced, sir, to the pitiful, not to say contemptible, spectacle of seeing the question of an important treaty between two great nations belittled by all the politics and all the outside issues and all the devices and all the methods which characterize the small-beer politics of a ward meeting. That is the way it is proposed to consider this treaty. Be it so, sir; but rest assured of one thing: our bluster is not going to do us any good. Our proposition to whip Great Britain, which is so glibly talked about by Senators, is not going to aid the settlement of the fisheries question. It is not going to elevate us in the estimation of the civilized world one particle, but it may catch some votes.

Abuse of Great Britain and an enumeration of the wrongs which she has committed in the world in the course of her history will not aid us in the solution of this fisheries question. It will not aid us to avoid a war. It will not aid us to settle all these troubles and get those rights we think our fishermen ought to have without a disturbance of the peaceful relations which exist between us and all other countries. It will not aid us a particle, but it will probably get some man's vote who will be controlled by this appeal to his prejudices who could not be reached by an appeal to his reason.

That is the purpose of this shameful stepping down. But be assured further, that the sober patriotism of the American people will not long submit to this trifling with their interests and their dignity. They well know that a treaty for the honorable settlement of a great question has been negotiated, in the line of unbroken precedents, and submitted to the Senate with a modus vivendi which affords us two years to try it before we need to become bound by it; they know, too, that the present efforts of its friends are directed to postponement in order that this trial may be had; and I warn you, Mr. President, they will hold somebody to a fearful responsibility for the results which may follow a rejection of this treaty. Inflammatory and extraneous appeals have marked the course of this discussion.

I think it is a small spectacle. It is a melancholy one to me. To-day the Senate of the United States (it is claimed for it, at least) is one of the ablest and one of the most dignified bodies of political officials who assemble together anywhere in the world. This exhibition will not bear out that high pretension. This exhibition stamps us with the fact that we are created of the same clay as other men, and that, in the language of the Widow Bedott, Senators, or Representatives, or what not, "We are all poor critters."

I have been very sorry to see it. I held my peace so long as I thought I could. I did not desire to address myself to this fishery question; I thought I would leave it to those gentlemen who from locality were more interested in it, and whose time had been given to the investigation of it historically; but when I saw that all of the research, all the legal argument, all of the great historical facts which had been brought out in support of the reasonable propositions of this treaty availed for nothing, and that it had come to be a mere political contest, as any other that could be broached upon the eve of an election, and was treated accordingly, I felt that I could not be satisfied unless I denounced that dangerous method of conducting our negotiations with foreign nations. Having done so I shall not detain the Senate any longer, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. MORGAN. There are still other Senators on both sides of the Chamber, I am informed, who desire to debate this question and who perhaps are not ready at this hour to do so. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

DEATH OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to the Congress and to the people of the United States the death of Philip H. Sheridan, General of the Army, which occurred at a late hour last night, at his summer home in the State of Massachusetts.

The death of this valiant soldier and patriotic son of the Republic, though his long illness has been regarded with anxiety, has nevertheless shocked the country and caused universal grief.

He had established for himself a stronghold in the hearts of his fellow-countrymen, who soon caught the true meaning and purpose of his soldierly devotion and heroic temper.

His intrepid courage, his steadfast patriotism, and the generosity of his nature inspired with peculiar warmth the admiration of all the people.

Above his grave affection for the man and pride in his achievements will struggle for mastery, and too much honor can not be accorded to one who was so richly endowed with all the qualities which make his death a national loss.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 6, 1888.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, nothing that I can say is needed to set forth the loss the country has suffered by the death of the able, brilliant, magnificent soldier and beloved gentleman, General Sheridan. I have just learned that the course I propose has been adopted by the House of Representatives. I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Chair is requested to appoint a committee of seven Senators to attend the funeral services of the late General Sheridan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the resolution may be now considered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed as the committee under it Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. CULLOM, Mr. STEWART, Mr. HAMPTON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. GRAY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 7, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, August 6, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock. The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered prayer, as follows:

O Eternal God, we stand awe-stricken to-day by the startling intelligence that the illustrious career of the General of the Army is ended. The brilliant story of his achievements is written in the annals of the country, and he has gone to the bar of history. We commend to Thy almighty protection and fatherhood the wife who has been widowed and the children who have been made fatherless by this sad event. Impress upon us all, we beseech Thee, a solemn sense that in the midst of life we are in death, and help us to live lives of virtue and piety, that when our last hour is come we may be soothed by an unfaltering trust in Thy mercy, and pass from that life to Thy presence, where is fullness of joy, and to Thy right hand, where are pleasures forevermore. We humbly pray through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled the bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob Y. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I send to the desk a resolution, and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday next, August 14, after reading the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OATES. I object.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow an amendment to be offered to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the introduction of the resolution.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the attention of the Speaker for one moment. This being suspension Monday, I move to suspend the rules and put this measure on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not make that motion at this time. Under the rules a motion to suspend the rules is not in order until after the call of States and Territories.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Well, let the resolution remain at the desk until it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has been recognized now to make a request for unanimous consent, not for a motion to suspend the rules. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions offered now must be referred to the appropriate committee in accordance with the rule.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I withhold my resolution for the present.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. CHIPMAN introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas there are pending before Congress various measures for the relief of soldiers of the late war, reported favorably by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, some of which measures are subject to difference of opinion and some of which are not; and

Whereas it is wrong to delay consideration of those measures concerning which there is practically no difference of opinion, and which are necessary for the comfort of the soldiers who are embraced in their provisions: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That on Friday evening next the House shall consider the following-named bills, namely:

H. R. 1688, relating to claims for pensions by dependent parents.

H. R. 1537, to allow soldiers and sailors in the United States service who have lost both arms an increased pension.

H. R. 1422, relating to pensions granted by special act of Congress.

H. R. 1420, for pensioning prisoners of war.

H. R. 1333, to amend the pension laws in relation to the payment of pensions.

S. 1529, to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693, Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

S. 509, authorizing an increase of pension in cases of deafness.

S. 1000, to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States.

S. 379, to allow soldiers and sailors in the United States service who have lost both hands an increased pension.

IMPORTATION OF ENGLISH STEAM-SHIP.

Mr. BUCHANAN introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

Whereas one Joseph Cumings has a contract from the War Department for the excavation of 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, and has chartered for use in filling such contract the English steam-ship State of Alabama, a vessel built in 1873 at Glasgow, Scotland, to run between that port and New Orleans, which vessel is now being fitted out at the Erie basin with a new dredging machine owned by an English syndicate; and

Whereas it appears by the following letter that the said steam-ship has been allowed to be imported free of duty for that purpose:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 2.

"SIR: The Department is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War, in which, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, he requests that Joseph Cumings, who has a contract under the War Department to deliver 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, may be permitted to import to our port without payment of duty thereon and use for the purpose of fulfilling this contract a large foreign vessel adapted for the necessary powerful machinery. It is represented that no domestic vessel of sufficient strength and capacity can be obtained for the purpose mentioned, and that it is of the utmost importance that the work be completed prior to the 1st of December next or during the present working season, which can only be done by the use of said foreign vessel. The Chief of Engineers states that the vessel referred to is to be used solely for the purpose of carrying out such contract, and that she will not engage in any way in the coastwise trade. Under the circumstances you are authorized to comply with the request of the Secretary of War.

"C. S. FAIRCHILD,
"Secretary of the Treasury.

"COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, New York."

And whereas it is alleged that domestic vessels of sufficient strength and capacity could have been obtained for that purpose and were ready to be chartered: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested and directed to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence, orders, and decisions in his Department relating to said matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN also offered the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

Whereas it appears by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the collector of customs at the port of New York, dated June 2d instant, that the said Secretary is in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War in which, upon recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, he requests that Joseph Cumings, who has a contract under the War Department to deliver 800,000 cubic yards of material from the main ship-channel in New York Harbor, may be permitted to import through our ports without payment of duty thereon and use for the purpose of fulfilling this contract a large foreign vessel adapted for the necessary powerful machinery; and

Whereas upon receipt of said letter from the Secretary of War the said Secretary of the Treasury instructed the said collector as follows: "Under the circumstances you are authorized to comply with the request of the Secretary of War;" and it is alleged that under the said instructions the steam-ship State of Alabama, built at Glasgow in 1873, has been so entered and is being fitted up at Erie basin, in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., with machinery owned by an English syndicate, for such work: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of said recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, of his said letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and of all correspondence on file in his Department relating to said matter.

WILLIAM HEDGES.

Mr. DAVENPORT offered the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to report to the House of Representatives the amount of the commissions of William Hedges, late postmaster at Bradford, N. Y., computed upon the eight quarterly returns he made between July 1, 1870, and July 1, 1872, under the act of 1854, and the amount of salary paid to him for his services between the 1st of July, 1870, and the 1st of July, 1872.

ALLEY, SQUARE 288, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 11099) to close, condemn, and sell part of alley in square 288, Washington, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF CERTAIN INCOME TAXES.

MODEL OF NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 211) providing for the purchase by Congress of a model of New York Harbor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A MINIMUM RATE OF WAGES IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, introduced a bill (H. R. 11102) to establish an interstate minimum rate of wages in the United States and Territories and the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Labor, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSIT OF MAILS IN AND THROUGH CITY OF NEW YORK.

Mr. COX introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 212) for the appointment of a commission on the more rapid transit of the mails in and through the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE SAWYER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a petition and have it read.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order under this call. The gentleman can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. I ask unanimous consent to present the petition and have it read.

Objection was made.

Mr. COX. Is not this a matter of privilege? It looks to an impeachment.

The SPEAKER. It is not. A resolution to impeach is a matter of privilege, but this is merely a petition or memorial.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California. I ask unanimous consent to have the petition printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The petition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The people of San Francisco, in mass meeting assembled, for the purpose of devising some means to save our State from the incoming of Chinese coolies, whose immigration is expressly prohibited by the laws passed by you, do represent as follows:

We recognize that Congress has responded to the wishes of the people of the United States by adopting such legislation as we all deemed necessary to and adequate for that end. That such legislation would have been sufficient to accomplish the end for which it was intended had it been enforced in good faith, according to the spirit in which it was devised, there can be no doubt.

Although the law has been upon the statute-books since 1882, and was amended four years ago with the intent to strengthen its provisions in order to meet the technical objections raised by the judiciary on the Federal bench of this coast, the fact remains that a larger number of Chinese are entering the port of San Francisco to-day than have entered at any other time in our history. There are practically no greater restrictions upon the entry of Mongolians than upon that of Europeans, the only difference being that a head tax is imposed upon Mongolians for the benefit of the courts instead of the Treasury.

Thus have the efforts of Congress to protect American labor from ruinous and degrading competition with a servile race been defeated. The situation is so alarming as to endanger the peace of this State, because the judges whose duty it is to uphold the law have brought the administration of the law into contempt.

If not to the law, where can the people look for protection? If the efforts of Congress heretofore to protect the people shall continue to be thwarted, the people must and will protect themselves.

By your act of 1882 as amended it was provided that certain certificates would be the sole evidence of the right of any Chinaman to land. The administration of this law was placed in the hands of the collector of customs. In the attempt to carry out the provisions of this law the customs officials have been thwarted at every step by the mandates of the Federal courts. By the abuse of the right of habeas corpus the administration of the act has been taken from the hands of the collector of customs and usurped by the courts. The examination of Chinese on board ships by the customs authorities provided for in your act, which was the greatest safeguard against the fraudulent landing of coolies, has been vetoed by the Federal courts, although it was approved by the President. So determined have been the judges to defeat the plain and only purpose of the law that they have gone the length of threatening with imprisonment the customs officials who have sought to perform the sworn duty imposed upon them by the Congress and President of the United States. Since you ordained in 1884 that no Chinaman should enter this country without possessing a certain certificate showing his right to land 9,000 have been landed by habeas corpus. This violation of law has been accomplished through the agency of the Federal judges, who have set up a standard of their own, above and in defiance of the law. Clothed with that discretion which is inseparable from a proper exercise of the judicial office, they have in every instance used it in behalf of the Chinese and against the spirit of the law. Every doubt has been resolved against the interests of the people. Had they been paid attorneys of the Chinese while sitting on the bench they could not have worked more persistently and eagerly at throwing down the guards which you set up against this immigration. Each coolie landed by habeas corpus represents legal fees amounting to $20. The circuit court, which is the conduit through which this Asiatic filth flows, has for its fee-receiving clerk a near relative of the judge. So great has been the inpour of this profitable though forbidden immigration that the regular machinery of the court has proved inadequate to the demand. A subsidiary court not contemplated by statute has been created for the admission of Chinese, and no fee now goes to waste. This subsidiary court receives a fee of $3 for every Chinaman landed, and does its work at the rate of one Chinaman every ten minutes during business hours.

At the present time there are in San Francisco's Chinatown no less than 4,000 certificateless coolies landed upon habeas corpus, turned loose on bail and awaiting examination. Many of them have been on shore as long as six months. The only proof of prior residence required by the circuit court and its annex from these men is an ability to answer certain questions to show a slight familiarity with the geographical features of San Francisco and the entry of their names in the books of the Chinese Six-Companies, or in the accounts of a Chinese merchant. Every one of this army of coolies can secure his final discharge at the expense of a false oath and the payment of the required fees. Meantime this swarm of Asiatics, who are supposed by law not to be in the country, are actively competing with American labor in all branches of industry and aiding in the reduction of the scale of wages to the Chinese level. The amount represented on the bonds for which Chinese residents are sureties is already in excess of the assessed valuation of all the property owned in San Francisco by the Chinese population.

That the interpretation placed upon the law by Judges Sawyer and Sabin and Commissioner Houghton is not a necessary but an arbitrary interpretation is shown by the brief sitting of Judge Ross, of the southern district of California. This jurist was recently invited to sit upon the circuit bench in this city. His rulings were such as to exclude the Chinese, and such as to spread dismay and panic among the whole colony of fee-receiving officials, coolie brokers, attorneys, straw bondsmen, and all other parasites who are living and fattening upon the decaying remains of the restriction act.

Judge Ross's sitting was brief. He has not been invited to sit on the circuit bench again. He has been dropped from Judge Sawyer's visiting list.

We, the people of San Francisco, appeal to Congress to end this monstrous conspiracy, to save the Pacific coast and the country from the consequences of an abuse of judicial power unparalleled since the time of Jeffreys.

The House of Representatives has created a committee to investigate the subject of contract labor. We invite that committee to visit this city. We promise to place before it facts which will demonstrate the truth of every allegation made in this memorial. When this proof has been made and submitted to Congress we demand remedial action. What that action should be is self-evident. No law which you have placed upon the statute-books has been able to withstand the hostile and destructive assaults of the Federal judges of this coast. You have given us a new treaty and contemplate the passage of a still more stringent exclusion act. We are grateful for these honest efforts to save us from Chinese association and competition, but in the light of experience what confidence can be felt that any law or any treaty will be carried into effect while its administration rests in the hands of judges who have annulled every existing statute? While they remain upon the bench Chinese exclusion is impossible.

We demand the impeachment and removal of Lorenzo Sawyer, judge of the United States circuit court of the ninth circuit, and of George M. Sabin, district judge for the district of Nevada.

Adopted in mass meeting of trades unions and citizens of San Francisco, July 25, 1888.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill; that the amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole be agreed to; and that other amendments not exceeding three in number and one amendment in the nature of a substitute may be offered to the bill, after which the vote shall be taken on such amendments, and then on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and the final passage thereof without debate or other intervening motion or business.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARNES, Mr. HOOKER, and others demanded a second.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. BARNES. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was delivered to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

PROPOSED TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER. A second is demanded, and the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES.]

Mr. PAYSON. I would like to have the resolution again reported.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. How would this resolution, if adopted, affect a pending amendment which was introduced and undisposed of at the time the bill was last under consideration?

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all. It will have no effect upon it.

Mr. PAYSON. When this bill was being last considered an amendment of mine had been read and was pending. I had the floor at the time the House adjourned.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is on the floor for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish to know how this would affect that amendment; whether it would be excluded.

Mr. SPRINGER. It was not disposed of at that time. It was pending and would be covered by the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, on examining the resolution, that if it should be adopted it would necessitate the offering of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois again.

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PAYSON. It is evident that the Speaker does not agree, then, with the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The resolution provides that amendments already agreed to in Committee of the Whole shall be adopted by the House, with the right of offering certain other amendments specified in the resolution.

Mr. PAYSON. Then I hope the resolution will be voted down.

Mr. SPRINGER. And one of the amendments referred to there is the identical amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois himself, if the gentleman will take my word. It does not preclude other amendments, but makes provision for a certain number which may be offered.

Mr. PAYSON. Of course I am perfectly willing to take the gentleman's word, but I wanted a ruling from the Chair as to the effect of the adoption of the resolution on the pending amendments.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution in its present form is adopted, it would preclude other amendments except those specified in the resolution itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. But it would not preclude action on the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state, the resolution provides that amendments heretofore adopted in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be agreed to by the House, so that this resolution disposes of those amendments; but it provides further that three additional amendments may be offered, as well as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. NELSON. It provides that three, but only three, amendments may be offered.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the resolution; and also a substitute.

The tellers will take their places.

Mr. HOOKER. I rose, Mr. Speaker, a moment ago to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I wanted to address to the Chair this inquiry: I understand that under the rules of the House governing the business for this day it is set apart for a suspension of the rules and the passage of measures, bills, resolutions, or otherwise, which are pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union or other committees, and the motion is to discharge such committee from the consideration of the matter and put it upon its passage, the action thereon requiring a two-thirds vote. In the present instance the resolution refers to a measure which is pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and has been under consideration for several days in committee, to which various amendments have been offered; and my inquiry is, whether it is within the power of a single member of this House on this day, which is fixed for the suspension of the rules, to defeat the consideration of that measure and others that may be pending by proposing a vote upon the bill——

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOOKER. Or whether or not there should not be consideration of every single measure in Committee of the Whole, and whether that rule does not apply to this measure as to any other?

The SPEAKER. It is not within the power of any single member to take action, such as the gentleman suggests, which would be binding upon the House; but it is within the power of the House, on the motion of any member who may be recognized for a motion to suspend the rules to-day, by a two-thirds vote to fix a day for the consideration of a measure; to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the measure and put it upon its passage, or generally, with reference to such question, to make such order in regard to its disposition as the House may see proper. In this instance, the gentleman's motion is to fix a day for the consideration of the bill coupled with certain conditions, on which the House must take action.

DEATH OF GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the message from the President of the United States received a few moments ago be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. The request of the gentleman from Georgia will not interfere with the pending action of the House, will it?

The SPEAKER. It will suspend the vote upon the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. But will not interfere with the question? If it does, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked for objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, and none was made. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to object now, if it interferes with the pending vote.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman is too late in making his objection.

Mr. CRISP. The purport of the message is, no doubt, well understood by the House, and I presume there will be no objection to the request.

Mr. HATCH. It is too late, anyhow, to object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the Speaker to hold that it will interfere with the pending order of business on which the House is engaged?

The SPEAKER. Necessarily, it will; during the time it is being read, at least.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should feel compelled to object if it interfered with the present order of the House.

The SPEAKER. It does, of course. It suspends the proceedings of the House. But the Chair would be very glad if the gentleman from Illinois would state distinctly whether he objects or not.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point of order that the gentleman can not object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to the Congress and to the people of the United States the death of Philip H. Sheridan, General of the Army, which occurred at a late hour last night at his summer home in the State of Massachusetts.

The death of this valiant soldier and patriotic son of the Republic, though his long illness has been regarded with anxiety, has nevertheless shocked the country and caused universal grief.

He had established for himself a strong hold in the hearts of his fellow-countrymen, who soon caught the true meaning and purpose of his soldierly devotion and heroic temper.

His intrepid courage, his steadfast patriotism, and the generosity of his nature inspired with peculiar warmth the admiration of all the people.

Above his grave affection for the man and pride in his achievements will struggle for mastery, and too much honor can not be accorded to one who was so richly endowed with all the qualities which make his death a national loss.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 6, 1888.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, this is the third time in the history of our country that Congress has received from the President the painful information of the death of the commanding General of the Army of the United States.

On Wednesday, December 18, 1799, the news of the death of General Washington reached Philadelphia, and the illustrious John Marshall, of Virginia, in a voice that indicated the anguish of his mind and a countenance expressive of the deepest regret, arose and said:

Mr. Speaker, information has just been received that our illustrious fellow-citizen, the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army, and the late President of the United States, is no more.

Though this distressing intelligence is not certain there is too much reason to believe its truth. After receiving information of this national calamity so heavy and so afflicting, the House of Representatives can be but ill fitted for public business. I move you, therefore, they adjourn.

Major-General Jacob Brown died on Sunday, February 24, 1828, and when Congress met the following morning appropriate resolutions were adopted, the announcement being made by General William Henry Harrison, then a Senator from Ohio, and subsequently President of the United States.

To-day we are informed that the most distinguished soldier of this time on active duty in his profession, General Philip Henry Sheridan, after a heroic struggle, eminently illustrative of his determined character, died last evening.

Animated by feelings engendered by an association of more than a quarter of a century and prompted by admiration for his high soldierly qualities, I sent to the Clerk's desk resolutions which I believe expressed the sense and the feelings of this House regarding what all must look upon as a national affliction.

I am now informed that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, has, by the direction of that committee, prepared and desires to introduce resolutions of the same import.

Sympathizing with the natural and commendable desire of those gentlemen to have the Military Committee of the House prominently identified with the tribute of respect paid by the Congress of the United States to the memory of the Commander of the Army, I desire to yield them the floor. But before doing so I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the resolutions now in the hands of the Clerk be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The resolutions are as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with deep sorrow of the death of General Philip Henry Sheridan, the Commander of the Army of the United States;

That in his death the country has lost a valuable and patriotic citizen, the Army a brave, wise, determined, and sagacious commander, and the world a distinguished military leader;

That the House deeply sympathizes with the family of the late General of the Army in their bereavement, by which they have lost a tender and devoted husband and father;

That the Speaker of the House appoint a committee from this body to attend the funeral, of which committee it is the sense of the House the Speaker should be a member;

That the flag of the House shall be continuously displayed at half-mast until the funeral obsequies are performed, and that the House manifest its sense of the loss the country has sustained by such other marks of respect as the Speaker may direct;

That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the distinguished dead the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to have the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Alabama printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask that the resolutions which I sent to the desk may be read and considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has stated that he rises to make a parliamentary inquiry, and the Chair will hear him.

Mr. WARNER. Let the resolutions first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has learned with profound grief of the death of General Philip Henry Sheridan, general commanding the Armies of the United States.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House is directed to transmit to the widow of the deceased a copy of these resolutions and an assurance of the sympathy of the House in the loss which she has sustained in common with the people of the nation.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House appoint a committee of seven members to confer with a like committee of the Senate, and after consultation with the family of the deceased, to take such action as may be appropriate in regard to the public obsequies of General Sheridan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of these resolutions.

Mr. WARNER. Without withdrawing the resolution that is now pending I wish to say that no business that could possibly come up before the House would induce me to object to the consideration of such resolutions as those offered by the gentleman from Mississippi at this time.

Mr. HOOKER. It is hardly necessary that I shall say anything upon these resolutions. They were compiled on the order of the Committee on Military Affairs to express the sense of the House at the great calamity that has befallen us in the death of the Commander of the Armies of the United States. Descended from a race of people who have given to the world in the old country and in our own the greatest commanders of any people on earth, the career of the distinguished military man whom these resolutions are designed to honor is a mark of the singular fact that in this country there is no position either in civil or in military life that is not within the reach of the humblest citizen of the land.

The parents of General Sheridan came to this country at an early day. General Sheridan was born March 6, 1831, in Perry County, Ohio. General Sheridan inherited from them something of the fire and the pride of that great Irish race which has so successfully fought the battles of all countries save their own. He graduated at the Military Academy at West Point in 1853, was assigned at once to duty in the Army, and during the late war between the States he earned for himself by his valor a position second only to that of the greater leader of the Federal Army during the war between the States.

During this session Congress has taken note of the high achievements of General Sheridan as a military man, and as standing second of the leaders of the forces of the Union Army in the late war, and conferred upon him, only a few weeks before his death, the distinguished position of General of the Army. It has been held by few persons. It was considered a mark of honor due to him while he yet lay on the bed of sickness, which was finally the couch of death, and was conferred upon him as an evidence of the national regard for his distinguished services as a general. This distinction was conferred on him for the valuable service of long days, months, and years in the service of his country from the time he graduated at West Point in 1853 down to the period of his death. These resolutions are designed now to express the universal grief and sorrow of this nation at the death of the Commander of the Army of the United States, and expressive of the sympathy with his bereaved family which will be felt in every corner of this vast country; for, sir, from his immediate family circle to the remotest parts of the country, linked as it is by the telegraph lines, the whole nation is shocked by the tidings of the death of General Philip H. Sheridan. I ask the unanimous adoption of the resolutions as a token of the respect of the nation for that distinguished general.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to support, on behalf of my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs, the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER]. General Philip H. Sheridan entered the volunteer service of the United States as colonel of the Second Michigan Cavalry, and the Peninsular State, which I have the honor in part to represent, always claimed him as hers so far as his military record in the volunteer service was concerned. That black steed, so famed in poetry and song, on which Sheridan rode "into the fray from Winchester, twenty miles away," that one immortal charger of the war, of which the poet so picturesquely wrote:

> And there, through the flush of the morning light,
> A steed as black as the steeds of night
> Was seen to pass as with eagle's flight,
> As if he knew the terrible need;
> He stretched away with his utmost speed;
> Hills rose and fell; but his heart was gay,
> With Sheridan fifteen miles away—

That famous charger was a gift of the citizens of the State of Michigan to General Sheridan. Mr. Speaker, there will be many sore and sad hearts in the Peninsular State to-day, hearts of brave men, loyal and true men, who followed Sheridan into the fray not only at Winchester but on many another field.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the time nor is this the place to enter into lengthy remarks in regard to the character or the services of General Sheridan. This is not the time to speak either of his greatness and gallantry as a soldier, of his modesty as a man, of his loyalty to the flag which he followed, or of his boundless fame. I doubt not that opportunity will be given hereafter for some appropriate eulogy upon the great soldier. But I now only desire on behalf of my colleagues and of the State which I in part represent to record our profound grief that this one of the last of the great and brilliant galaxy of generals who made illustrious the epoch in which they lived has departed. One by one the men that have bound us to the heroic period of the Republic pass away, and soon the last will be gone. But three men have borne the commission of General of the armies of this Republic—Grant, Sherman, Sheridan.

The great and silent commander is gone; his great lieutenant and cavalry commander has now followed his chief; while the sun of that great strategist who with his sixty thousand "marched down to the sea" is serenely setting.

Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the State which sent him with her commission into the volunteer service of his country I second the resolutions and trust that they may be adopted without a dissenting voice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I did not propose when the resolutions were offered to say anything, and I would not do so now did I not feel that it is proper that some one representing the State of Ohio should speak at least a word on this occasion. I had the honor when first elected to Congress to represent the district in which General Sheridan had lived, from which he went to West Point, and in which is established the home to which he always returned on occasions when business permitted his absence from the headquarters of the Army. He was born at Somerset, in the county of Perry, on the 6th day of March, 1831. His father was a native of Ireland and had resided for a brief period in the State of New York, but Sheridan's mother, who died within the last few weeks, always pointed out to the visitor at the old homestead the house in which young Phil was born and from which he went to the Military Academy at West Point.

He was appointed by General Ritchie, a member of Congress from the county of Perry, who held the office, I believe, for but a single term, and left behind him as a monument to his own discrimination the appointment which he made of the little Irish boy who had been a water-carrier upon the works where his father was laboring in the construction of the Hocking branch of the Ohio canals.

The fame of Sheridan as a soldier is large enough and grand enough to be shared in common by the loyal people of the whole United States. I am not familiar with the circumstances under which he went into the volunteer service from the State of Michigan, but I remember very well that at an early period in the war, I think at or at least shortly after the battle of Shiloh, he was commissioned a brigadier-general by the President of the United States. Probably his rank as such was from July, 1862. From that time his fame outgrew the limits of States and became commensurate with the entire Union.

I want to say a word as to his soldierly character. It has often been said of Sheridan that he was a man of dash, and it has been attributed to him that he was to a certain extent even a reckless soldier. Something over a year ago I traveled with him for two days and nights in going to and coming from a reunion of soldiers in Ohio, and I then had an opportunity to converse with him freely and at some length upon his career and many incidents of the war. Among other things he spoke of the impression I have mentioned and said what was new to me, and which will be a matter of interest at this time, that he had never made a military move of any considerable importance in his life that was not carefully and studiously planned, and that he gave to every movement all the time and all the thought and consideration that was possible under the surrounding circumstances. In short, he said there could be no greater mistake made than to attribute to him anything like recklessness, or, as he put it, spirit of dare-devil, in any military move that he ever made. No, he planned carefully, deliberated fully, and then executed as the lightnings do. He was the incarnation of war, but the machinery was moved by skill and study.

He said further:

Whatever success I achieved I attribute more to the fact that I did everything under a plan which I had studied than to any other one circumstance.

Mr. Speaker, Sheridan is dead. His great warm heart lies cold and dead. His memory is the common heritage of the loyal people of the whole country. He will rank ultimately, in the peculiar line of war that he adopted and in which he made himself conspicuous, as without a rival among the names which became famous in the great conflict through which we passed, and his modest demeanor since the war has left in the hearts of the American people a sense of comradeship and a love of his memory which will continue to grow for many years to come.

But, sir, this is not a fitting time for extended eulogy. I thought it proper that from the State he loved and honored some voice should speak to second the adoption of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. The hearts of the people of Ohio are burdened with a great sorrow to-day. They share with the people of the whole country in this great grief.

The question being taken on the resolutions of Mr. HOOKER, they were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce hereafter the committee provided in these resolutions. In accordance with the second resolution, the House now stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3339) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Moore, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Susan A. Starkweather, praying to be allowed a pension, reported a bill (S. 3426) granting a pension to Susan A. Starkweather; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5690) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell block of land 108 in the city of Houston, Tex., reported it without amendment.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3091) granting a pension to John Carr; and

A bill (S. 3114) granting a pension to Joseph H. Harwood.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2241) for the relief of the minor children of Orison S. Baldwin, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3242) granting a pension to John Smith, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8087) for the relief of Thomas Strodder;

A bill (S. 3236) granting an increase of pension to George A. Washburn, late major Sixteenth Connecticut Volunteers; and

A bill (S. 3112) granting an increase of pension to William H. Marston.

JULIAN MYERS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A paper yesterday was overlooked, a disability bill, and as the friends of the gentleman are in a hurry about it, I ask leave to report the bill now and have it put on its passage. I report, with a little amendment describing the place of residence, the bill (S. 3181) to remove the political disabilities of Julian Myers.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 4, after the name "Myers," to insert "of Georgia;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all political disabilities which Julian Myers, of Georgia, has incurred under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed—two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3427) to amend section 4474 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 3428) granting a pension to Mary C. Thompson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 3429) granting a pension to Maria N. Abbey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Ordered, That Mary C. Thompson have leave to withdraw the papers in her case from the files of the Senate.

COTTON-BAGGING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, authorized and required to inquire into the truth of the alleged combination or pool of the producers of cotton-bagging; also what companies or individuals compose said pool, their methods of combination and doing business, the effect of the same upon prices of this article of necessity to all cotton producers, together with any and all other matters relating to the same which may call for or suggest legislation by Congress, and report the same to the Senate with such recommendations as the committee may think proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business, that order is closed and the Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1544, a bill (S. 2832) for the relief of General William F. Smith.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that for that bill there be substituted the House bill, which is of the same character, Order of Business 1984.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith will be substituted for the bill just reached on the Calendar. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out "colonel" and insert "major of engineers;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint William F. Smith, late major-general United States Volunteers, to the position of major of engineers in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade (the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent); and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William F. Smith.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if this was a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and if there is a written report accompanying the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. There is as to the Senate bill and also as to this bill a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs. The amendment proposed to the House bill places General William F. Smith, usually known as General Baldy Smith, on the retired-list at the actual rank he held in the service. The bill as passed by the House proposed to raise his rank one grade. Conforming to the uniform rule of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, he is kept at the grade which was his at the time he left the service.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska how long since Colonel Smith, if he was a colonel, or General Smith was discharged from the Army?

Mr. MANDERSON. My recollection is that about the year 1870 he resigned from the military service. The report, however, will show it fully, if the Senator desires accurate information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire to have the report read?

Mr. BERRY. No, sir; I do not care to have the report read. I simply wish to state that where military officers have resigned and engaged in other business, and thereafter come and ask to be reinstated and retired upon pay, I am opposed to such legislation. I presume it is impossible to defeat the passage of the bill, but I was anxious to know whether the entire committee had agreed to the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the yeas and nays shall be taken on the passage of the bill I think it no more than right and just to this officer, who had a most distinguished military service, none more so, that the report bearing upon the case be either read or appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is the Senate report on the Senate bill which I desire to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2832) for the relief of General William F. Smith, have had the same under consideration, and report the same back favorably and recommend its passage as amended.

The prayer in the bill as offered was that the President nominate, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, said William F. Smith and appoint him a major-general in the Army, and place him on the retired-list as of that grade, the list to be extended to that extent.

Following the line of precedent established by your committee in cases of this character, the bill is amended to allow said Smith to be nominated and appointed and retired, but only as a major of engineers in the Army, which was the rank he held at the time of his resignation, March 21, 1867.

The service of General Smith is set forth in the following communication, received by your committee from the Adjutant-General United States Army:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, May 17, 1888.

"Statement of the military service of William F. Smith, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office:

"He was a cadet at the United States Military Academy from July 1, 1841, to July 1, 1845, when he was graduated and appointed brevet second lieutenant, Topographical Engineers; promoted second lieutenant July 14, 1849; first lieutenant March 3, 1853; captain July 1, 1859, and major Corps of Engineers March 3, 1863. He resigned March 21, 1867.

"He was mustered in as colonel Third Vermont Volunteers July 22, 1861, and mustered out August 14, 1861, having accepted the appointment of brigadier-general of volunteers to date August 13, 1861. He was appointed major-general of volunteers July 4, 1862, which appointment expired by constitutional limitation March 4, 1863, not having been confirmed by the Senate. He was again appointed major-general of volunteers March 24, 1864, and resigned his commission as such November 4, 1865.

"On March 13, 1865, he was breveted brigadier-general United States Army 'for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Chattanooga, Tenn.,' and major-general United States Army 'for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the rebellion.'

"He served as assistant topographical engineer on survey of the northern lakes from October 1, 1844, to October, 1846; as assistant professor of mathematics at the United States Military Academy from November 6, 1846, to August 21, 1848; as assistant topographical engineer on explorations in the Department of Texas and on survey of boundary between the United States and Mexico to December, 1852; on survey of canal route across Florida to October, 1853, and on explorations in Texas to August, 1855; asistant professor of mathematics at the United States Military Academy from September 4, 1855, to September 8, 1856; engineer of the eleventh light-house district to November 3, 1859, and engineer secretary of the Light-House Board to April 15, 1861; on mustering duty at New York City to May 31, 1864; topographical engineer of the Department of Virginia to some time in July, 1861; colonel Third Vermont Volunteers to August 14, 1861, and commanding a brigade in the Department of Northeastern Virginia and subsequently in the Army of the Potomac to October 1, 1861; commanding a division in the Army of the Potomac to March 13, 1862, and the Second Division, Fourth Corps to July 17, 1862; on sick leave to August 12, 1862; commanding the Second Division Sixth Corps to November 16, 1862; the Sixth Corps to February 4, 1863, and the Ninth Corps to March 8, 1863; on sick leave to May 25, 1863, and sick in New York City to June 17, 1863; commanding a division, etc., in the Department of the Susquehanna during the Gettysburgh campaign to September 5, 1863; chief engineer of the Department of the Cumberland from October 10 to November 5, 1863, and of the Military Division of the Mississippi to March 16, 1864; commanding the Eighteenth Corps from May 2 to July 19, 1864; awaiting orders to November 22, 1864; on special duty under the orders of the Secretary of War to December 15, 1865; on sick leave to February 1, 1866, and on leave to March 21, 1867, upon which date he resigned.

"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General."

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska, while it is probably not proper to go into the action of the committee, if it is not a fact that in this case and in several others of distinguished officers who have gone out of the service there has been a substantial agreement on both sides to reinstate them and to let them be retired at the rank which they held in the regular Army, and not their rank in the volunteer service?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say in reply to the Senator from Maryland that I know of no agreement between the two committees, if that is what he refers to; but there is a rule of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate that where an officer who was in the regular service shall be placed upon the retired-list it shall be with the rank he held in the regular Army. General William F. Smith achieved the rank of major-general of volunteers, and his service, which is so well known to the country, was in that position and not in his position as major of engineers. The House, recognizing his very great service, raised him a grade upon the retired-list, and the bill as it came from the House and as read proposed that he should be placed on the retired-list with the rank of colonel. The Senate committee, however, holding to its uniform rule in that regard, proposes to amend the House bill by placing him on the retired-list with the rank of major of engineers.

I will say further, in reply to the Senator from Maryland, that which perhaps is not very well known, that this is a case somewhat exceptional in its character. General Smith has reached a very advanced age and is in very poor circumstances. He is a man who has suffered physically. Whether he is now upon the pension-list I do not know, but he could go there if he would make application, beyond a peradventure, for he was a man who, during his service in the war, did receive, as I understand, very severe injury.

Mr. GORMAN. The point of my inquiry was to get the information, and this bill being a unanimous report from the Committee, I trust that my friend from Texas will withdraw his request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COKE. I decline to do so.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Texas desires the yeas and nays, I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Without losing its place.

Mr. FRYE. Without losing its place.

Mr. MANDERSON. Do I understand that it is simply to be passed over informally?

Mr. FRYE. Simply informally.

Mr. MANDERSON. So that it may be called up at any time.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, it may be called up at any time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object to that course, provided the bill may be called up when there is a full Senate.

Mr. FRYE. It would simply break up the business we are engaged in if we should have a call of the roll now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRYE. I did not mean, of course, that the bill for the relief of General Smith should be displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understood that the bill was simply passed over until there was a fuller Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be put on the passage of the bill whenever the Senator from Nebraska shall so indicate.

BADGES OF MILITARY ORDERS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 56) granting permission to officers and enlisted men, members of the military order of the Loyal Legion of the United States and of the Grand Army of the Republic, to wear the badges adopted by those orders was announced as the next business on the Calendar.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1321) for the erection of a marine hospital at Evansville, Ind.

Mr. BECK. I object. I object to going off the Calendar when we have got to it at last. I do not care how meritorious the bill is, it will be reached like the rest of the bills on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution 56 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 3, to strike out "badge" and insert "badges;" in the same line to strike out "society" and insert "societies;" in line 4, to insert "Cincinnati, the Aztec Society, the National Association of the Veterans of the Mexican War, the," and in line 6, after the word "and," to strike out "that adopted by the society;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the distinctive badges adopted by the societies of the Cincinnati, the Aztec Society, the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War, the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, and of the Grand Army of the Republic may be worn upon all occasions of ceremony by officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy who are members of said organizations.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Military Affairs report to strike out the preamble; which will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

The title was amended so as to read:

A joint resolution granting permission to officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States members of the Society of the Cincinnati, the Aztec Society, the National Association of Veterans of the Mexican War, the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States and of the Grand Army of the Republic to wear the badges adopted by those orders.

CHARLES B. NEWTON.

The bill (S. 2556) for the relief of Charles B. Newton was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. There is a minority report in that case.

Mr. MANDERSON. While I am extremely anxious for the passage of the bill, there is a minority report which was drawn by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I see he is not now in his seat. I therefore ask that the bill be passed over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution reported by

Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on Foreign Relations to invite international arbitration as to differences between nations.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over on objection under Rule IX.

W. S. CARPENTER.

The bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to W. S. Carpenter, late an employé in the railway mail service, $126.65, the amount of his salary from the 3d of October, 1882, until the 20th of November, 1882, for services actually performed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANTHONY L. WOODSON.

The bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson was considered as in committee of the whole.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Is there a proposed amendment to the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment appears upon the text before the clerks.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The recommendation of the Committee on Claims was to strike out the last clause of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report indicates that an amendment was contemplated by the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move that the bill be amended by striking out the last provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9, after the word "use," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words:

And the further sum of $2,300, being the value of engineer stores taken in the same way for the construction of forts, stockades, and so forth, at and near Munfordville, Ky.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Anthony L. Woodson, of Woodsonville, Ky., the sum of $3,666.20, being the value of quartermaster's stores taken from the said Woodson by the United States forces during the late war, and appropriated to their use.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, were appointed.

COMMISSIONS ON PRIVATE DIES.

The bill (S. 953) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers to restate, settle, and pay to the owners of private dies the balance of commissions due them was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. That bill seems to make a very large appropriation. It seems to have been reported from the Committee on Claims. I should like to have a little further information than is given by simply the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who reported the bill, is not in his seat at this moment.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that it be passed over informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PRINTING OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

The bill (S. 3162) providing for the printing of Government publications upon private orders was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut how this bill changes existing law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I shall have to get the statute.

Mr. DAWES. Can not the Senator state in general terms?

Mr. HAWLEY. The first section is new, practically.

Mr. DAWES. I thought there was an existing law substantially like that, providing that documents could be ordered from the Public Printer while they were going through the press at a certain percentage.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is right in one respect. The old law is put in here with the proposed change of a word or two as a new section, and the old law is repealed, so that the whole law on the subject is in these two sections. The change is not material.

At present, at the time a book is going to press, you can order as many as you please. We provide also now that afterwards, a year or two or three years hence, if there is a demand for a book, and many of the men who deal in second-hand books and Government publications say there is, and they come along and are very anxious to get copies they may do so. They say if we will make a rule by which they can go to the Government Printing Office and give the Public Printer the cost, with 10 per cent. additional, and get a number large enough to make it worth while to go to press, they will avail themselves of it.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator if that would not allow the book trade to get any valuable documents furnished them for their trade at the cost to the Public Printer with 10 per cent. added?

Mr. HAWLEY. They can do it now, and in many cases we should be delighted to have them do it. The public wants a document and Congress dislikes to order five, ten, or fifteen thousand more. Here come along some of these dealers and they say, if you will just let us have those idle stereotype plates, we have a constant demand for the book. I am satisfied it will be for the good of the public.

Mr. DAWES. Would the customer get the book at a reduced price?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that the customer would get it cheaper. It is not a very cheap book even with the Government selling it at cost and the 10 per cent. added, because though the Government Printing Office is a magnificent one and a costly one, a private printer would publish the 400,000 copies of the Agricultural Report at a cheaper rate than the Government does it. I do not know that the public would get it cheaper, but the Government could print it more cheaply.

Mr. DAWES. Is it true that the Government printing is greater in cost than the private production of the same work?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is difficult to calculate, because we have considerably more than a million dollars, probably with buildings and all a million and a half dollars at least in that office, and we do not stop to count the expense of repairs, the interest on the money, and all that.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator state——

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me finish my sentence. We do not stop to count the cost of the plant as the ordinary manufacturer has to do. When we talk about a book, under the rules we ask for an estimate of the cost of the book and it comes up here, the Agricultural Report we will say, 30 or 35 or 40 cents, or something of that sort, counting only the cost of composition, paper, and press-work, but we take no account of the great plant. If we take that into account evidently the Government printing is expensive.

Mr. DAWES. I will concede anything to the experience and judgment of the Senator from Connecticut, but if it be true that production at the Government Printing Office, not counting the cost of the plant, will furnish to the book trade a cheaper production than can be done by private enterprise, then the result, I should apprehend, would be that the book trade would make a great profit out of such a work while the customer would not get any benefit.

Mr. HAWLEY. Unless we pass something of this sort, as a general rule those stereotype plates lie there idle for years until they are remelted. The publishers themselves think that we should open more of the Government books to public use. I shall not talk longer about it, but, for example, there is the very valuable series of books, the Medical and Surgical History of the War. I do not know that they would give me that as an illustration, but it is quite possible that that would be one the country would be very glad to be allowed the privilege of paying for additional copies of, and the medical fraternity throughout the country would not care a farthing whether it was 25 per cent. or 40 per cent., or what it was, probably, if they could get the book.

Mr. MANDERSON. The only change in the existing law by the first section of the bill is that it changes the title of the person formerly known as the Congressional Printer so as to make it conform to the existing law wherein he is called the Public Printer, and providing that when Congress is not in session these books may be printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, which is also to make the provision comply with the existing law. The only new legislation in it is in section 2 of the bill. I propose, however, at the suggestion of my colleague on the Printing Committee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], to add at the end of section 2 this provision, and I shall move the amendment at the proper time:

And the Public Printer shall annually report to Congress a list of all documents and publications sold by him, the amount received therefrom, and the disposition made thereof.

That will require of him to make the same sort of a report which is made by the Secretary of the Interior. I send the amendment to the desk that it may be inserted at the end of section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2:

And the Public Printer shall annually report to Congress a list of all documents and publications sold by him, the amount received therefrom, and the disposition made thereof.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not know that that fully meets the suggestion made by my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Maryland. My intention is, though I may not have fully expressed it, that the Public Printer shall not only make this report showing the number of publications sold by him, but the disposition which may have been made of the amount received.

Mr. GORMAN. That covers precisely the idea I had in my mind.

Mr. MANDERSON. That covers the Senator's idea?

Mr. GORMAN. The amendment is satisfactory to me.

Mr. BECK. I understand that these publications are confined exclusively to publications ordered by the Government.

Mr. GORMAN. As a matter of course; it could not be otherwise.

Mr. BECK. Then I look at it in this way: Whenever there is such a demand for extra copies that the public want them from booksellers and others, that demand will become clamorous enough to require us to publish extra copies at our own expense, which they would be sure to get through, and we should pay for them all unless we allow it to be done in this way.

Mr. GORMAN. I think that is unquestionably the fact. The Medical History of the War is a very expensive book. We published a large number at a cost of several dollars a volume. There is demand for that publication now, and the members of the Committee on Printing believe that the pressure is so great that, though it will involve great expense, probably another edition will have to be printed unless this provision is made; and it applies to a great number of other valuable books. Now, by authorizing the Public Printer to print them, if the order comes during the recess of Congress, and permitting the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to order them, the result, I think, in the end, will be not only a great saving to the Government, but a great accommodation to the public, and the people will get the works at much less cost than from private hands.

Mr. BECK. And save us from paying?

Mr. GORMAN. I think so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOURNALS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the consent of the Senate to go back on the Calendar and consider Order of Business 1158, which was passed over informally. It is a bill reported by the Committee on Printing, and will take but a moment to dispose of. It is designed to correct the difficulty spoken of by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and save the publication of the numerous Senate and House Journals, for which there is no need.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been passed over without prejudice, the Senator from Nebraska has the right to ask for its consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2802) to fix the number of unbound and bound Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to provide for their distribution.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say a word in view of the statements that were made some weeks ago by my friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who is not in his seat this morning, and it is due I think to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, who has given this matter very great attention, that I should make a statement.

The bill now under consideration does reduce very largely—indeed, more than one-half, as I recollect the figures—the number of Senate and House Journals to be printed.

The entire scope of the investigation suggested by the Senator from Missouri has not been taken up by the committee for the very proper and good reason that until some arrangement shall have been made for extending the Printing Office and making it so that it shall be a fit place for the people who are compelled to work and be in it (for it is now a disgrace to the Government) by making the addition which is provided for in the sundry civil bill for the condemnation of property adjoining the present building, so that the folding-room and other facilities for the purpose of handling public documents, and making them practically under one head in the distribution—all the matters complained of by the Senator from Missouri can not be reached.

I only want to say, as the minority member of that committee, that I think the chairman and the majority of the committee are pursuing the right course, and if Congress shall agree to the provision which is now in the sundry civil bill by amendment for that extension, an important and radical change can be made, not only in the distribution of documents, but in the mode of sending them out, by which I believe three or four hundred thousand dollars per annum may be saved.

I rose to say that and to call special attention to it, as I have in private called that of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the gentlemen in charge of the conference on the sundry civil bill. It is not only a matter of humanity, but it is a disgrace to the condition of affairs in that office to compel these people to remain in such an atmosphere; and even on the score of economy I believe we can save some three or four hundred thousand dollars, and this is the first step in that direction.

The bill was passed.

COLORED INDUSTRIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. PALMER. I ask that Order of Business 735 be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BECK. I object.

Mr. PALMER. It is a bill that was passed over informally. It is in the line of the order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the bill was passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar, any Senator would have the right to call it up under Rule VIII.

Mr. BECK. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was seeking to displace the Calendar.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 1156) to encourage the holding of a national industrial exposition of the arts, mechanics, and products of the colored race throughout the United States of America, to be held in the years 1888 and 1889.

Mr. BECK. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over under Rule IX.

Mr. BECK. I do not wish it to lose its place.

Mr. BROWN. I hope it will be understood that the bill does not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over without prejudice, then.

JESSE COE.

The bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Jesse Coe, of Monroe County, Kentucky, of $375, for horses taken from him by the United States Army and used by the same during the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. STEWART June 14, 1888:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe, having considered the same, report as follows:

The bill under consideration passed the House at this session on May 15. The facts in the case are stated in the report of the House Committee on War Claims, which your committee adopt as a part of this report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Said report is as follows:

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Jesse Coe, report as follows:

"This is a claim for three horses taken from the claimant by the Army of the United States in 1864. Claim stated at $450.

"Claimant filed his claim in the office of the Quartermaster-General, and in 1881 the claim was disallowed by that officer for the reason that he was unable to certify that he was convinced of the loyalty of the claimant. The agent who investigated the claim states that the horses were taken from the claimant and were worth $375.

"Your committee believe that the claimant was a loyal citizen, and report back the bill, and recommend its passage with the following amendment: In line 5 strike out 'four hundred and fifty' and insert in lieu thereof 'three hundred and seventy-five.'"

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator who reported the bill why this claim was not presented to the Southern Claims Commission?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the bill had better go over. I do not care to have it lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will not be laid over. It is a just claim, and has been pending a long time before Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been passed over under objection, and debate is not in order unless the Senator from Vermont withdraws his objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw it for the moment. I did not wish the bill to go over under Rule IX. I merely wished to look over it, if the committee has not done so, and see whether the claim was presented to the Southern Claims Commission which sat upon such claims of citizens, unless there may be some exceptions, and we ought to know whether this claim was presented there and paid or rejected, and, if rejected, why it is that we are called upon to reconsider it.

Mr. BECK. May I be allowed to say a word? I know a little about this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the time being, with great pleasure.

Mr. BECK. This case was understood by the committee of the House not to be a proper case for presentation before the Southern Claims Commission. The only question was whether this man was in fact a loyal man. The proof on all other points was abundant. Dr. W. GODFREY HUNTER, the Representative in the lower House—a very respectable Republican gentleman, by the way—came before the committee and made ample proof, he himself being an officer of the Army of the United States and being with him at the time, of the loyalty of this man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is simply on the question of loyalty, but I want to know why this was not within the jurisdiction of the Southern Claims Commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I will state that this claim originated in Kentucky, a loyal State, and under the law of July 4, 1864, was required to be presented to the Quartermaster-General, if for quartermaster's stores, or to the Commissary-General, if for commissary stores. The same kind of claims which originated in the insurrectionary States were required to be presented to the commissioners of claims known as the Southern Claims Commission. Under the law of July 4, 1864, about sixty thousand claims originating in the States of Missouri and Kentucky and West Virginia and Maryland and Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana, very few in Kentucky, and some in the non-insurrectionary portions of Virginia and Tennessee, after they were declared to be no longer in insurrection, were presented to the Quartermaster-General, and probably some ten or fifteen thousand to the Commissary-General under this law.

The Commissary-General has acted upon all the cases presented to him. The Quartermaster-General has nearly completed the consideration of all the cases presented to him. Of the claims presented to the Quartermaster-General at least forty-five thousand have been disallowed, rejected, or not allowed, upon principally two grounds, almost exclusively upon two grounds: First, that the Quartermaster-General was not convinced of the loyalty of the claimant—the language of the law of July 4, 1864, was that the Quartermaster-General had to be convinced of the loyalty of the claimant; and, second, that the stores were actually taken for army purposes and so used. The Quartermaster-General disallows the claims, or refuses to allow them, or rejects them. In the beginning of the consideration of them they did not disallow them; they just simply said that they do not allow them because they are not convinced of the loyalty of the claimant or because they are not satisfied that the stores were actually used for army purposes. That is, where the soldiers would go and take things and there would be no evidence that it was done by authority of the Army, or that the soldiers were needing such articles at that time and that they were for army purposes, payment was not recommended. It seems in this case the only question is that the Quartermaster-General did not allow this claim because he was not convinced of the loyalty of the claimant.

Mr. BECK. The Quartermaster-General stated the amount and fixed it?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

Mr. STEWART. There is no question about the amount. There was only a question of loyalty, and the House report is clear on that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the limitation of debate under Rule VIII. Each Senator is entitled to speak but once and for five minutes only on one bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ask unanimous consent to continue this conversation two or three minutes more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand the Senator from Missouri to mean, as far as the point I raised was concerned, that this claimant was not within the jurisdiction of the Southern Claims Commission. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not within the jurisdiction of the Southern Claims Commission, but expressly within the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster-General, and the Quartermaster-General has considered the claim and refused to allow it, because he was not convinced of the loyalty of the claimant.

Now, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to make one further explanation in regard to the 4th of July claims, so that we can all understand them. As I said before, about 45,000 have not been allowed or rejected or disallowed, many of them on the same ground as this claim, because the Quartermaster-General was not satisfied as to the loyalty of the claimants. Application after application has been made to the Quartermaster-General to reopen, to reconsider, to react upon these cases, and the Quartermaster-General has uniformly refused to reopen or reconsider the cases, and about three or four years ago an appeal was taken in some cases to the Secretary of War, asking the Secretary of War to direct the cases to be reopened, and the Secretary of War decided that he had no right to do it.

These 45,000 claimants (for there must be about that number that have to-day no legal remedy) can not come and have their claims reopened in the Department, and the only thing is either for Congress to consider them individually or provide by general legislation. As to whether Congress will consider them individually or whether they will provide by general legislation is for Congress to determine.

Mr. STEWART. I wish simply to make one remark in regard to it. The only question being as to the loyalty of the claimant, General Hunter came before the committee, and knowing all the circumstances, stated most positively in regard to that fact, and there is no question about the fact of loyalty. That was a matter of testimony before the House committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Quartermaster-General, whoever he may have been, is not to be condemned at this late day for having done his duty under the law, in refusing to allow a claim where the claimant could not prove to his satisfaction that he had been loyal, the point being under the law in regard to these quartermaster claims that claims for property taken by the Army or for the use of the Army from persons engaged in making war on the United States were not the subject of just claims against its Treasury. I think, therefore, that the Quartermaster-General did right in refusing to allow this claim and the other 45,000 until it was proved to his satisfaction that the claimants were on the side of the flag and not against it. It may be perhaps a little revolutionary and reactionary for me to say this, but still I am under the necessity of saying it.

In the second place, the Senator from Missouri says that these 45,000 claimants are without redress, because the Quartermaster-General has found against them. He was the tribunal that the statute set up, an impartial tribunal, to pass upon exactly this class of claims, and just as likely to be right in respect of his investigation into the loyalty of the claimant and the circumstances of the taking of the property as any committee of Congress; and I say so with great respect. We know how committees of Congress are imposed upon and dealt with, doing the best they can to guard against fraud and misrepresentation and misapprehension, so that I do not feel that the 45,000 people about whom so much has been said are under any different category to what they would have been if they had been allowed to go to the Court of Claims and that court had decided against them.

If the action of a tribunal appointed by the Government to settle these questions of property taken during the war by the Army is to be overruled by Congress, as in a case like this, and so of all the other 45,000, then we shall come pretty near to what some people have feared, that some time or other, I will not say when, we should come in the end on the complete restoration of the ancient powers of this Government, to pay all claims of everybody, no matter which side he was on or what the nature of the claim was.

That is all I have to say. If, as the Senator from Missouri says, the Southern Claims Commission had no jurisdiction of this claim and this class of claims, of course there is nothing in that suggestion. I will look at it, however, and if it turns out or appears to turn out that he was in error I will enter a motion to reconsider. I do not wish to interfere with this claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARBLE PORTICO FOR WEST FRONT OF CAPITOL.

The bill (S. 3184) for the construction of a marble portico and for encasing the center of the western front of the Capitol was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. That bill was introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] who is absent. I desire to make a motion that it go over without prejudice, and mainly for this reason: we are now engaged in constructing a great marble work in front of the Capitol, for which we made appropriations nearly two years ago, ordering it to be done long before this time, but the work is not yet half finished and the season is very well advanced, and it is not likely to be finished for a year or two longer, and until that is done or some assurance given that we are going to have some better management, that we are going to have this front finished within the lifetime of some of us, I am not going to vote for any more of these marble monuments and things that are now sought to be added——

Mr. HAWLEY. What reason is assigned for the delay?

Mr. BECK. It is claimed that the Vermont people do not furnish the marble fast enough; then that they have some trouble with the workmen; and the Architect of the Capitol and the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] do not seem to be in as much of a hurry as the rest of us, but we want to hasten the work if we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 435) to further provide for the disposal of the public lands in the State of Alabama was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is too large a bill for five-minute debate. I think it should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 2544) authorizing and directing the President of the United States to make proclamation prohibiting the importation of products of foreign states in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is reported adversely, and will be passed over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1071) granting a pension to John Hancock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is reported adversely, and will be passed over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 994) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is reported with amendments and with the views of the minority. It will go over under the general rule without prejudice.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN IOWA AND NEBRASKA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7776) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, in the county of Monona, in the State of Iowa, and in the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-route.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not care to have that bill go over to be disposed of under Rule IX, but I ask that it may be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

WILLIAM GRAY.

The bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of William Gray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to issue to William Gray, late a private in Company F, Sixteenth Regiment of Michigan Volunteer Infantry, a certificate of honorable discharge, to bear date the day and year in which such regiment was mustered out of the military service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH G. SWANK.

The bill (S. 3196) for the relief of Joseph G. Swank was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph G. Swank, late a private in Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, the pay and allowances of a private soldier from the date of his muster into the service to the date of his honorable discharge, deducting therefrom all pay and allowances received by him, such payment to be made notwithstanding the proceeding and sentence of the court-martial in his case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON June 21, 1888:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2813) for the relief of Joseph G. Swank, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

During the past few years there have been many cases of hardship growing out of the late war brought to the attention of this committee, and wherever the facts have justified favorable action relief has at all times been granted. The case of Joseph G. Swank is without doubt the severest case of hardship that has been presented to the author of this report for examination during his term of service in the Senate. For a clear and impartial understanding of it, it is necessary to go somewhat into detail.

Joseph G. Swank was born on the 2d day of November, 1844, at Mifflin, Columbia County, Pennsylvania. He was about a year old when his father died in destitute circumstances, leaving a widow. On January 19, 1848, one Stephen Kikendall was appointed his guardian by the orphans' court of Columbia County (see affidavit of Stephen Kikendall, hereto annexed, marked A).

About the 9th day of September, 1862, young Swank enlisted in Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, to serve three years, or during the war, being then under eighteen years of age. A short time previous to the period when he enlisted he went to his guardian for the purpose of getting his consent to enter the Army. The guardian asked him if he had his mother's consent, to which the boy did not reply, but hung his head. The guardian knew that matters were not right from the action of young Swank, and peremptorily refused to allow him to go without his mother's permission. Later on the guardian happened to visit young Swank's house and found him making preparations to leave for the war. The mother opposed him in his purpose and wept bitterly because the boy persisted in going. At that time he was her sole support, her father, who had been supporting her since her husband's death, having been stricken with paralysis, leaving her altogether dependent upon her son's labor, he being employed on a farm (see affidavit of Caroline Swank, appended hereto, marked B).

Young Swank, however, unmindful of his mother's wishes, from patriotic motives or otherwise, enlisted. He was mustered into the service of the United States within a few days after his enlistment at Harrisburgh, Pa., and was encamped at Camp McClellan, near that city. About the 1st day of November, 1862, while in that camp, he was taken sick with bone scurvy, as pronounced by the surgeon, and continued ill until the regiment to which he belonged received orders to move to the front (see affidavit of Daniel C. Swank, hereunto annexed, marked C). He was too sick to accompany his regiment, and was ordered into the militia camp until the horses were put upon the cars, with the understanding that when the regiment was ready to move he would be called for and passed out if he was able to go with the regiment. The regiment, however, moved off to the front without any one notifying him, and as he was unable to perform military duty at the time he could not follow them, as he was not in a condition to move about. After remaining at the camp for two days after his regiment had gone, he boarded a canal-boat and started for his home at Mifflin, and on arriving there he immediately wrote to his captain, A. H. Rush, and obtained a furlough. Swank's present recollection is that he received a furlough for thirty days, and that before the thirty days expired he had his physician, Dr. James Wilson, of Berwick, Pa., to write to the captain and have the time of his furlough extended for sixty days more, as he was unable to move about without great suffering. He was still unable to perform military service at the expiration of the sixty days and was granted a second extension.

As the doctor was not constant in his attendance he did not see him to have another extension granted, but after some further time had elapsed he so far recovered from his ailment as to be able to do military service, when he concluded to return to the Army. He being under the age of eighteen years at the time of his enlistment, and the only child of his widowed mother, she again most emphatically refused to consent to his going to the front, and said that she would see to obtaining his discharge, as his age would excuse him, and his physical condition was such that he could not endure the hardships of military service. At the time his furlough or leave of absence had run out his legs from his knees to his ankles were broken out in several places with running sores, and his physician said that he did not desire to heal them, as it would produce a cancerous sore and result seriously. As he was young and inexperienced he did not know what was necessary to be done to obtain his discharge, and all things were left to his mother.

While matters were being arranged he was called upon by two persons who told him that his presence was required at Bloomsburgh, Pa., to testify in a case then being tried there. He went to Bloomsburgh, and immediately upon his arrival was arrested and taken before William Silvers, the provost-marshal, then stationed at that place, upon the charge of desertion. A writ of habeas corpus was issued in his behalf and for his detention until he could be heard, and his case was heard before the provost-marshal, E. H. Little, esq., an attorney, then and now residing at Bloomsburgh, being present in his behalf (see affidavit of E. H. Little, hereunto appended, marked D). It being shown before the provost-marshal (William Silvers) that he was under the age of eighteen years, and that he had no intention of deserting, but had simply remained at home at the earnest solicitation of his widowed mother, she assuring him that his discharge should be secured to him, and it having been further shown that he had not procured the consent of his mother or his guardian to enter the service of the United States, the provost-marshal said that he was perfectly satisfied that these facts were sufficient to secure his discharge from the military service, and that the affiant should accompany him to Harrisburg, and he would have him mustered out of the service (see affidavit of Stephen H. Swank, appended hereto, marked E).

Upon young Swank's arrival at Harrisburg he was handed over to the provost-marshal there and directed to remain there until called for by William Silvers, the Bloomsburgh provost-marshal. Swank never saw Silvers again from that time until after the close of the war. He states in his sworn affidavit presented to the committee that he firmly believes that the papers in the habeas corpus proceedings were never handed over by Silvers to the proper authorities, so that he might receive his discharge. Immediately after being turned over to the provost-marshal at Harrisburg he was taken to the guard-house at Camp Curtin; thence to Baltimore, Md., where he remained in the guard-house one night; thence to Washington, D. C., where he was also placed in the guard-house. After remaining there three or four days he was taken to Alexandria, Va., and placed in the Prince street military prison; thence he was brought before a military court, and, without a chance for defense or hearing, court-martialed and sent to Forest Hall shortly afterwards, where he was confined for some time; thence to the old county jail, all in the city of Alexandria, Va.

He was confined here for two weeks; thence taken to City Point, Va., and placed in a "bull-pen," as it was very properly called; thence to the division headquarters guard-house; thence to the Dismounted Camp guard-house; thence to the regimental guard-house; thence to the company guard-house, and after being incarcerated in all these prisons, held as a deserter, cruelly, unjustly, and without cause, for a period of three full months, was sent to his company and regiment near Petersburgh, Va., where they were in winter quarters near the Boiden plank-road. The charge of desertion, as read to him, was to the effect that he had deserted or "left his company and regiment at Baltimore, Md., without leave of absence," while the fact is, as above shown, that he had not been to Baltimore with his regiment, but had gone to his home direct from Harrisburg, Pa. The sentence of the court-martial was—

"That the time spent in prison prior to the court-martial was not to be allowed him, but that his term of service should be served in full, and that he was further sentenced to serve said term for the sum of $5 per month, instead of the regular monthly pay; to pay $30 for his arrest, and to forfeit all back pay."

From the time of receiving his sentence he was detained in the several prisons named, enduring all manner of hardships, receiving no pay for all this time, and only receiving some $5 or $7 for his whole service at the time of his discharge at the expiration of his enlistment. Notwithstanding the sentence of the court-martial he received an honorable discharge, a copy of which is hereunto appended, marked F.

The purpose of the bill, as introduced, is to set aside the sentence of the court-martial on the ground that he was not a deserter, as is shown by the fact that he was several times furloughed; that the papers in the writ of habeas corpus were suppressed through no fault of his own, and that had the papers been delivered there would have been no just ground for a court-martial; further, that being under the age of eighteen years and the only son and sole support of a poor widow, he was not legally chargeable with desertion.

Swank was undoubtedly too young and headstrong at the time of his enlistment to manage his own affairs, or the difficulties into which he fell would never, perhaps, have occurred. He was not yet twenty-one years of age when he had served his full term of enlistment (three years) and had received his honorable discharge on the 11th of August, 1865.

As this offense was, at best, but a technical desertion and the Government having received his service for three years, for which he only received, according to his sworn statements "some five to seven dollars for his whole service at the time of his discharge," and as, notwithstanding the sentence of the court-martial, he received an honorable discharge, the committee are of opinion that justice and fair dealing demand that this much injured soldier should be paid for the time he actually served, and they therefore report the bill back to the Senate with an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, recommending that the bill (S. 2813) setting aside the sentence of the court-martial be indefinitely postponed, and that the substitute granting him compensation for his services be granted.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Columbia, ss:

In the matter of the petition of Joseph G. Swank, late private Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, for the setting aside of his court-martial and removal of the charge of desertion, etc.

On the 20th day of December, A. D. 1887, personally appeared before me, a prothonotary of the court of common pleas in and for said county and State, the same being a court of record, Stephen Kikendall, aged seventy-two years, a resident of the township of Nescopeck, in the county of Luzerne, Pennsylvania, who, being by me first duly affirmed according to law, deposes and says that on the 19th day of January, A. D. 1848, he was appointed guardian of the person and estate of Joseph G. Swank, above named, by the orphans' court of said county of Columbia. That a short time previous to the time when the said Joseph G. Swank enlisted in the service of the United States in the war of 1861 he came to the said affiant for the purpose of getting his consent as such guardian to enter the Army. That upon being asked if he might enlist, the said affiant asked him if he had his mother's consent, to which he said nothing, but hung his head. That he knew matters were not going just right from the actions of the young man, and he refused to allow him to go without his mother's consent. This, the affiant thinks, was only two or three weeks previous to his enlistment. That later on he went to the home of his ward, and on arriving there found him making preparations to leave for the war. That his mother opposed him in his purpose, and wept bitterly because he would persist in going, and the affiant also opposed his going without first having gained his mother's consent. That some time after his enlistment the said ward took sick, and on receiving the intelligence, Caroline Swank (his mother) and the affiant went to Harrisburgh, where said ward was camping with his regiment, to see him. The exact date of this visit affiant can not give, but thinks it was late in the fall.

That some time afterward the said ward returned home, and the affiant subsequently called to see him and found him sick. That some time subsequent to his return (the exact time not being known to the affiant) it came to the ear of the affiant that the ward was wanted as a witness in a certain trial at Bloomsburgh, Pa., and later on received word of his arrest, and that a writ of habeas corpus had issued and witnesses were to be examined, etc. That he was present at the hearing and remembers well that after the witnesses had been examined Captain Silvers, who was acting as judge or provost-marshal, said he (the ward) was all right; that all that would be required would be for the ward to accompany him to Harrisburgh, Pa., to obtain his discharge, and he would be free and could return to his home.

That the said affiant never consented as such guardian to his enlisting in the Army, and always most positively refused to allow him to go without the consent of his mother

The affiant further says that the said Joseph G. Swank did not return to his home after he had had his hearing at Bloomsburgh aforesaid, but was returned to the Army and remained there until near the close or at the close of the war; and further saith not.

STEPHEN KIKENDALL.

Also personally appeared L. S. Wintersteen and Samuel Smith, residents of Bloomsburgh, Columbia County, Pennsylvania, persons whom I certify to be respectable and entitled to credit, and who, being by me duly sworn, say that they are well acquainted with the above affiant; that they were present and saw the said Stephen Kikendall sign his name to the foregoing affidavit, and that he is the identical person he represents himself to be.

In the matter of the application of Joseph G. Swank, late private Company E, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, for the removal of the charge of desertion and the setting aside of court-martial in his case:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA, County of Columbia, ss:

On this 23d day of June, A. D. 1887, personally appeared before me, a prothonotary of the court of common pleas in and for said county and State, the same being a court of record, Caroline Swank, aged sixty-three years, a resident of the township of Mifflin, in the county of Columbia aforesaid, who being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that she is the mother of said Joseph G. Swank, who was born on the 2d day of November, 1844. That her husband, John Swank, died on or about the 11th day of March, 1846, when her son was but little more than one year old, and at the time of his death he was possessed of only about $60 worth of property. She also further swears that she was without means and was dependent for support upon her father, and continued to be supported and maintained, both as to herself and said son, by him until said son had arrived at sufficient age to assist in gaining for themselves a livelihood; that he continued to add to her support, and finally, after he had attained the age of thirteen years, he was her only support, and provided a good living for her until the time of his enlisting in the service of the United States in the war of 1861.

That at the outbreak of the war and sometime previously thereto her father was afflicted with paralysis, and she was in consequence entirely and solely dependent on her son for support. That early in the war he, the said Joseph G. Swank, was anxious to enlist in the war and endeavored to obtain her consent to do so, but that at all times she objected to his going, on the ground that he was too young to endure the hardships of war, and besides she was dependent on him for support, and could not therefore think of having him go; that he kept asking her to be allowed to go, from the outbreak of the war until the autumn of 1862, and finally, on or about the 1st day of October, 1862, he left his home without saying a word and enlisted in Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry; that while at Camp McClellan, near Harrisburg, Pa., he wrote her a letter saying what he had done and that he was now fast and could not honorably return home, and another letter subsequently, in which he wrote that he was sick and wanted her to come to see him; that upon the receipt of this letter she and her brother, Stephen Kirkendall, went to Harrisburg aforesaid, and endeavored to procure his discharge by reason of his age and the fact that she was dependent on him for support, but failed, and were obliged to leave him there, and return to her home.

That sometime near December, 1862, he returned home in a weak and sickly condition and stated that he had been left by his regiment at Harrisburg, they having gone to the front, and that the lieutenant of his regiment had placed him in a certain camp telling him to remain there until they were ready to move and he would then call for him, and he had not been called for and was too sick and feeble to follow up the regiment, and finally not knowing what better to do in his sickly condition he had boarded a canal-boat and come home. She further avers that on his arrival home he was suffering from bone scurvy and was all broken out with sores and had in addition thereto dropsy. That medical aid was brought in at once and he was cared for and continued to have the physician for a period of some six or seven months, when he was sufficiently able to move about and go to the office of the physician for medicines and thus save her expense, said physician being James Wilson, of Berwick, Columbia County, Pennsylvania, now deceased. That after he had partially recovered he was desirous of returning to the Army, and saying that as his furlough had run out he would be arrested for desertion unless he did; that she was unwilling to let him go, and came to Bloomsburgh, said county, and endeavored to secure his discharge, and after making her statement to the examining surgeon of the United States and to other prominent business men, she was assured that no harm could come to him under the circumstances, and returned to her home satisfied that all would be right.

She further swears that some time in the early winter of 1863 and 1864, or in other words, about the 20th to 25th of December, 1863, two men came to her house and inquired for her son. It was just tea time, and they invited them to sit up to tea. They ate their meal and afterwards produced a paper, saying it was a subpœna requiring him, the said Joseph G. Swank, to appear before the officers at Bloomsburgh, Pa., to testify in a case in which Andrew Freas was being prosecuted by the Government. That her son left with these men, who were strangers to her, and the next word she received from him was to the effect that he was under arrest for desertion, and her presence was needed. She waited on her brother, Stephen Kirkendall, aforesaid, and together they came to Bloomsburgh and looked up counsel to see if his release could be in any manner obtained.

After consultation a writ of habeas corpus was gotten out, and it was conclusively shown to the officer (at least he so said) that he had not deserted, and had enlisted without the consent of his mother or guardian, and, therefore, should be discharged, and all that was required (said the officer, William Silver) was for said Joseph G. Swank to accompany said officer to Harrisburgh, Pa., where he would secure for him his discharge, and he would be returned to her at her home. That her son accompanied said Silver to Harrisburgh aforesaid, but when there was not allowed to return home, but was forced through the various prisons until finally he got into his regiment again and served until the middle of August, 1865, when he returned home. She further saith that his discharge shows that he was honorably discharged from the service of the United States on the 11th day of August, 1865. She also further declares that it is her firm belief that said Silver never intended that her son aforesaid should be released or discharged from said service, but that in order to secure the offer by the Government of something like $35 for arresting and returning into service a deserter, he was willing to sacrifice the rights and feelings of all the parties interested in the proceedings above mentioned.

In the matter of the application of Joseph G. Swank, late private Company E, Sixteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, for removal of the charge of desertion and the setting aside of his court-marshal.

On this 25th day of June, A. D. 1887, personally appeared before me, a notary public residing in Schwenkville, in and for said county and State, Daniel C. Swank, aged forty-six years, a resident of Schwenkville, in the county of Montgomery and State of Pennsylvania, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he was a member of the above-named company and regiment and knew the said Joseph G. Swank while a member of the organization aforesaid; that while in Camp McClellan near Harrisburgh, Pa., in the fall of 1862, the said Joseph G. Swank was suffering from bone scurvy and dropsy and was unfit for military duty. I remember that Joseph G. Swank, at the time the Sixteenth Regiment received an order at Camp McClellan to proceed to the front, was sick and passed into Camp Curtin, and in the hurry and bustle incident to the shipping of equipments, horses and men, he was entirely forgotten and no arrangements made for him to follow the command, and therefore left behind.

DANIEL C. SWANK,
Late Second Lieutenant Company E, Sixteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

With reference to his record in service after his return to his command in the spring of 1865, I was told by an officer in command of the squadron during the engagement at Farmville, Hatcher's Run, and other engagements at the close of the war, that he was a gallant soldier and performed his duty faithfully as such.

I, E. H. Little, being duly affirmed according to law, say, that during the war, probably in the winter of 1863, was consulted by Joseph G. Swank, as his attorney, he being under arrest for desertion, William Silver, the provost-marshal, having arrested him. Joseph G. Swank was accompanied by his friends Mathias Hartman, Stephen Kikendall, and others. I took such legal steps as were available at the time to get him discharged, and think a considerable portion of the day had been occupied in the matter when, about my supper time or afterwards, I was informed by Joseph G. Swank's friends, Hartman and Kikendall, and perhaps others, that William Silvers was satisfied that he was innocent and that the matter had gone so far that he wanted to take him to Harrisburgh, and that he would then have him discharged.

It has been so long that my recollection is vague in regard to everything, except the trouble I had in the matter and the presence of the parties I have mentioned. I do not remember a single word that was spoken, only the impression I received and which I think must have got in conversation with Swank and his friends, as to what William Silvers said and promised, and that they seemed to feel satisfied to rely on said Silvers to have him discharged. I was well satisfied then, and am now, that if Joseph G. Swank had paid William Silvers a little more money than Silvers could get for arresting him, he would not have been arrested. After the war was over William Silvers went to live among the Indians, and is probably dead.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 2529) making an appropriation for the establishment of a light or lights and other aids to navigation to guide into St. Andrew's Bay, Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being adversely reported, this bill will be placed on the Calendar under Rule IX.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN IOWA AND NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. What disposition was made of Order of Business 1650, being the bill (H. R. 7776) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in the county of Monona, in the State of Iowa, and in the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-route? My attention was called away for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is passed over without prejudice on the objection of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

Mr. MANDERSON. I now ask that a vote may be taken on the Order of Business No. 1984, being House bill 9396, for the relief of General William F. Smith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that the House bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. The House bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has that been taken up instead of the Senate bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, it is taken up instead of the Senate bill, and an amendment, suggested by the Military Committee, made simply to change the grade from colonel to major of engineers.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was the rank he actually held?

Mr. MANDERSON. The rank he actually held at the time he left the service.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. MITCHELL (when Mr. DOLPH'S name was called). I desire to announce again that my colleague [Mr. DOLPH] is still detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], and would vote "yea," if here.

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. BECK (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. DAWES (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOAR] has been called away from the city by the sudden death of an early friend. He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. My colleague would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], but I am assured that upon this bill he would vote "yea;" I, therefore, vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], but after consultation with his colleague [Mr. SAWYER] I feel at liberty to vote on this bill, and I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. I am advised by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that his colleague [Mr. HALE] would vote "yea," if here. I, therefore, desire to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am requested to announce the pair between the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. BROWN. I understand a quorum has not yet voted. Although I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] I see his colleague votes in the affirmative, and I vote "yea."

Mr. GIBSON. I am informed that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], if present, would vote "yea." I, therefore, cast my vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 5; as follows:

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. CAMERON, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill S. 2832, for the relief of General William F. Smith, will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection, the House bill on the same subject having passed.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I report from the Committee on Printing the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 100,000 copies of a comparative statement embodying the present tariff law (act of March 3, 1883), with proposed amendments of H. R. 9051 (Mills bill), to be prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means, be printed for the use of the House.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution; and am directed by the Committee on Printing to move certain amendments thereto. It seems to be important that this document, which is in very great demand, making a comparison between the existing tariff and the Mills bill as it passed the House, should be speedily printed. There is a great demand for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the present consideration of this resolution, the amendments proposed by the Committee on Printing will be stated.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to amend the resolution in the manner indicated on the copy which I send to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to make the latter clause read:

With proposed amendments of H. R. 9051 (Mills bill), to be prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means, be printed, 75,000 for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

*This sentence will be erased should there be anything in the conduct or physical condition of the soldier rendering him unfit for the Army. [A. G. O., No. 99.]

D. C SWANK,
Captain, Commanding Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the resolution read as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 100,000 copies of a comparative statement embodying the present tariff law (act of March 3, 1883), with proposed amendments of H. R. 9051 (Mills bill), to be prepared by the Committee on Ways and Means, be printed, 75,000 for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there anything necessary in the way of a designation of the bill to identify it by the Public Printer or anybody else beyond its number? Is there any necessity in carrying out this resolution in the way of description to go beyond the number of the bill? It seems to me if there is any other description necessary, it should include only the title of the bill. In other words, there ought not to be put into the statute that which has come by way of familiarity to be a description of the bill in the public prints.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest that we strike out the words "Mills bill," and simply refer to it by its number.

Mr. PLUMB. Let the title of the bill be inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to make it read "House bill number so and so," and give the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed to change the description of the bill by making it read "bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I wish to say that I do not think we ought to go into this extensive printing of that comparative statement intended for public information until we get the report of the Committee on Finance of this body upon the bill, as probably they will have some amendments to suggest—I presume so—so that the comparative statement will have in a group the present law, the proposition of the House committee, and the proposition of the Senate committee. Then you will have a comparative statement that will be of some benefit for the purpose of public information; and I should hope that until we get that report, as I presume we shall very soon, this should lie over, and then we can have a print of the comparison all around that will be of some value for reference.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being reported today can be considered only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I reserve the right to object after hearing my friend from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to make one suggestion in respect to this document. The document has not yet been prepared, as I understand; it is not yet in print, and it seems to me that the true course now would be to print the usual number until we ascertain what it is, the extent of it; and of course afterward the necessary number may be printed; but I should think it might be well to see the document before we act upon it. I agree with the Senator from Vermont that it is better to let the matter lie over for a few days.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to give the reasons which have actuated me to speedy action in this matter. There was printed a small number, on the order of the House of Representatives, of what is known as a comparison of the existing tariff with the bill submitted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. This gives the existing law and the changes proposed by the bill referred to, printed in italics. Since the passage of the Mills bill so-called——

Mr. BECK. That bill was modified in the House of Representatives itself, so that that document does not give what the Senator says.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that, and was about to say that this document simply gives a comparative statement between the Mills bill as it was reported to the House and the existing tariff law. During the course of legislation in the House the Mills bill was very materially changed, and now it is proposed, as I understand it, by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, to publish a comparative statement the same as this, without comment other than the present law and the proposed law, showing the bill as it passed the House compared with the existing law.

I have been addressed within the last few days by a great many members of the House of Representatives, urging speed in the matter, as there is such great demand for this publication; and I would say on behalf of the Committee on Printing that we felt disposed to report this matter favorably because it seemed to concern very largely the House of Representatives. The cost of printing the 100,000 copies provided by the resolution as it passed the House is $2,638 only, costing but the very trifling amount of about $25 a thousand.

Mr. BECK. There have been demands made upon all of us that will absorb that edition. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the other gentlemen of the Finance Committee can act, and then the Senate proposals can be added to the House bill and the present law, but in the mean time the demands are so enormous that I think we ought to print a number of copies.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seemed to me, as a matter of courtesy to the House of Representatives, as this was in the nature of a report of one of their own committees on a matter of legislation that concerned them very largely, it would not be at least out of place for us to report favorably upon the resolution. We simply changed it to the extent of requiring that out of the 100,000 copies 25,000 should be for the Senate and 75,000 for the House.

Mr. HARRIS. It is very evident that this will be incomplete so far as the information the country wants is concerned. It is to be hoped that at no distant day the Committee on Finance will be ready to report, and that will probably show a third column, and yet another differing set of figures, and we shall certainly need a hundred thousand copies of that printed so soon as that report is made. If I am right in hoping that it will be only a few days until that report will be made, it is certainly better, as it seems to me, that we postpone action upon this resolution until then, and then print double the number of copies, if necessary, containing the entire information that the country will want—what the rate of duties is under the present law, what they are proposed to be made under the House bill, and what the Senate substitute may make them, if a substitute shall be determined upon.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. President, one word. The suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee is impracticable in the present form. If the bill becomes a law as it now stands, the changes are in italics. It shows what the law is now and what the House propose to make it. When the Senate acts on this proposition, the House bill in its present print can not be used for that purpose, because then it will require a different form of bill similar to the ones furnished to the Senate Committee on Finance, which the Senator from Tennessee has seen, embracing separate columns, a different character of print. This will be very useful and give both Houses of Congress and the country information exactly as to what has been done up to this time, and it can be done by a change of a word in italics here and there, simply showing the modifications the House made in regard to the bill as reported by the committee. That can be done. If we undertake to show all three, we shall have to have a form of print for which this will be absolutely useless.

I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, if it is a proper question, what the chances are as to the time when we may expect the Committee on Finance to report on the Mills bill? I understand from the public press that it will be at least a week yet before the Senate will likely get the action of its Finance Committee; and, in the mean time, the demand for this information all over the country is so great that this edition will be exhausted even before the week is out; at least I judge so from the demands made on me.

Mr. ALLISON. The reading of the resolution contemplates, as I understand, not only a publication of the existing law with the changes proposed by the Mills bill but other matter.

Mr. BECK. No other matter at all.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, if the object is simply to have the present law compared with the Mills bill, so called, as it was published some days ago when the Mills bill was introduced, before it finally passed the House, then I do not see any great objection to it.

Mr. BECK. I can see none.

Mr. ALLISON. But what I want is to see this document in print, and see what it is, and then I may be perfectly willing that 100,000 or 200,000 copies of it shall be printed. What we want to know is just what this statement is. If it is to be a mere republication of the existing law and the republication of the bill as it passed the House, I see no special objection to that.

Mr. BECK. That is just exactly what it is. It shows for itself.

Mr. ALLISON. But I happen to know that the House of Representatives is in a procedure which goes far beyond that; and therefore I should like to know precisely what it is that we are to print 100,000 copies of before I consent to it. That is all.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Iowa answer first the question of the Senator from Kentucky? I would be glad to have his opinion about the time the committee will probably report.

Mr. ALLISON. No one knows better than the Senator——

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me make this suggestion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. I make this suggestion, and I think it will meet the matter fairly, that the consideration of the resolution pass over, and we shall probably receive or the House will receive very shortly the document that is to contain this comparative statement that is to be prepared by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House. The usual number can then be printed. It can be printed in a day, and then it can be seen whether or not we want 100,000 copies.

Mr. BECK. I suggest, then, that this matter go over until to-morrow morning, and the Senator from Iowa and the other gentlemen can consult with the chairman of the Committee on Printing, and no doubt some conclusion can soon be arrived at.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I venture to suggest an improvement even on the suggestion of my good friend, and that is that it be referred to the Committee on Finance, and the gentlemen of that committee can see exactly what they want and just how they want it.

Mr. BECK. I would rather not take it out of the hands of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have disposed of the printing part of it.

Mr. MANDERSON. We feel no delicacy about that. We have work enough.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the resolution calls for the rate of duty provided by the Mills bill and by the present law. There ought to be a column embraced in the statement reducing the duties to ad valorem rates.

Mr. BECK. Another document is being prepared for that purpose, which will show the rate of duty under the existing law, the rate under the House bill, and the rate under the proposed Senate bill; but that is a very different thing from this altogether, and that will not be reached for two weeks. In the mean time the country desires to see what modification the Mills bill makes of the existing law. I suggest that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; and meanwhile I ask unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution, with the amendments proposed by the Committee on Printing, being referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. BECK. What does the chairman of the Committee on Printing say to that?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so referred.

WITHDRAWAL OF PUBLIC LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. WALTHALL. I ask to go back to Calendar No. 1532, being the bill (S. 2917) to withdraw the public lands in the State of Florida from all entry except homestead entry and settlement, so that I may make a motion to indefinitely postpone the bill. The object of that bill has been accomplished by other legislation originating in the House of Representatives. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM LAVERY.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I ask for the present consideration of a bill which was passed over in my absence. It is Order of Business 1519, being the bill (H. R. 610) for the relief of William Lavery.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Lavery $483.75, being the value of quartermaster's stores taken from Lavery by the United States forces during the late war and appropriated to their use, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS IN CONFEDERATE PRISONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that by inadvertence the call of the Calendar commenced this morning under Rule VIII with Order of Business 1544, when it should have commenced at Order of Business 1518. The Secretary will therefore report Order of Business 1518 by title.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 1518, being the bill (S. 1770) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in Confederate prisons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MAMMOTH HOT SPRINGS.

The bill (S. 3163) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use and accommodation of the post-office at Mammoth Hot Springs, in the Yellowstone National Park, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 1523) for the establishment of a light-house at Cob Point Bar, at the mouth of Wicomico River, in the State of Maryland, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments to this bill relate to different places.

Mr. BECK. A number of those items have been put on the sundry civil bill. I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills whose titles will now be read, having been reported with views of the minority, will be passed over without prejudice, retaining their places on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK:

A bill (S. 465) granting a pension to William Sackman, sr.;
A bill (S. 549) granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon;
A bill (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger;
A bill (S. 809) granting a pension to Betsey Mansfield;
A bill (S. 820) granting a pension to Davis A. Servis;
A bill (S. 838) granting a pension to Mary Sullivan; and
A bill (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz.

Mr. FRYE. What was done with the light-house bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. FRYE. What is the objection?

Mr. BECK. Many of the items have been placed in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator reporting the bill had better examine the sundry civil bill. My impression was that none of these were passed in it.

Mr. BECK. Yes, we took up quite a number of them and passed them in that bill.

Mr. PALMER. Have we got down to the light-house bill, Order of Business 1665? We went back to Order of Business 1518. I do not see what has become of Order of Business 1665.

Mr. FRYE. Order of Business 1665 was just objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 1665 has been stated and the amendments to the bill proposed by the committee were being read when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] objected to the further consideration of the bill, and it was passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the Senator having it in charge that the objection was made because it was said the sundry civil bill contained some of these amendments. I suggest that the Senator having it in charge examine the sundry civil bill, and wherever those amendments appear in that bill strike them out of this and call it up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the morning hour has now expired, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit for instruction and for the decision of the Senate the question whether the action under Rule VIII, when the Senate meets at 11 o'clock, shall continue until 2, as specified in the rule, or shall be concluded at 1 o'clock. The Chair desires to be instructed by the action of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Ohio will permit us to go on with the Calendar until 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no desire about it, except that I wish to say something upon the treaty to-day, because I have to leave to-morrow. If the Senate wishes to continue the morning hour further, I have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. It was held by the Senate at the last session that the morning hour did not expire until 2 o'clock, as it appears in express words in the rule that it runs until 2 o'clock without regard to when you meet. I prefer to adhere to the rule as it is so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits the question for the decision of the Senate to avoid the recurrence of it every morning hereafter. The rule specifically provides that the consideration of bills under Rule VIII shall continue, unless otherwise ordered, until 2 o'clock; that is, under the standing order for meeting at 12. Meeting at 11, the question arises whether the two hours contemplated by the rule shall continue and close at 1, or whether the rule shall be observed and the Calendar continued until 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. SHERMAN. At the last Congress the rule adopted was that the two hours provided for by the rule ended in two hours from the time of meeting. I do not care anything about it to-day; but I will state to the Senate that the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session will be in order even during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a privileged question. The Chair asks instruction of the Senate as to the interpretation of this rule when the Senate meets at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only say the usage has been to limit it to two hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] thinks not.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; and I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I am quite confident, though I have not looked at it since the date I refer to; but if he will look at the RECORD he will see that this question arose at the last session, when the Senate decided to meet at 11 instead of 12, and the morning hour continued until 2 o'clock, as by express rule it is so stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator referred to the Journal?

Mr. HARRIS. I have not looked at it recently, but I am very confident that the RECORD will show that we continued the morning business until 2 o'clock after the Senate had decided to meet at 11, and under the rule as it is written I do not see how we can do otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to enable the Senator to examine the RECORD I will submit my motion now.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator's motion is in order at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. If he finds that is the rule, the precedent ought to govern us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the precedents examined and the result indicated to the Senate hereafter.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with if there be no objection. The treaty will be reported by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if any other Senator wishes to go on at this time I will yield to him with pleasure. I have tried to ascertain if any gentleman on that side of the Chamber desired to speak. If not, I will proceed with what I have to say.

Mr. President, I had made up my mind, though chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, not to engage in this debate. I was satisfied to let the whole matter rest upon the report of the committee, the views of the minority and the majority, also upon the very able speeches that have been made, especially the exhaustive and controlling ones made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and also the speeches which have been made in favor of the treaty. But the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] felt themselves at liberty in the course of their remarks to refer to what occurred in the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that I can not decline to say something about the treaty without leaving a misapprehension on the minds of many Senators as to what was done there. In my judgment it was not in order in those gentlemen to refer to what occurred in committee; but that rule of propriety is often violated. I think it ought not to be done, but it is. I wish therefore in the first place to call the attention of Senators to some remarks made by those Senators in respect to this treaty and in respect of the action of the committee upon it. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in his speech on the 7th of June, 1888, said:

> It was a startling surprise to me, as it must have been to my colleagues on the committee, to find, as we did, on yesterday, by acknowledgments of no uncertain sort on this floor, that a caucus decree had preceded the discussion of the treaty, which forbade the allowance of any amendments by its friends or the friends of any sort of negotiation, by which it could be in any way improved or made more acceptable to the country. That caucus edict has crushed an amendment that was presented in committee by a very distinguished Senator of the majority, and has silenced other Senators on that side who said that they had amendments to offer.

I presume the remark made by the Senator from Alabama referred to myself and to the amendment that I had proposed to offer at one time in the committee. As to the first paragraph of his remarks I can assure the Senate that so far as I know no caucus agreement, no caucus order, no proceeding in caucus, no remark made in caucus was ever made to my knowledge that tended in the slightest degree to influence the action of any Senator in regard to offering amendments to the treaty. The only subject of conference by what are called the caucuses of the respective parties in this body related to the mode of proceedings, whether with open or closed doors. I know of no other. I am quite sure there was no other. So the Senator's charge falls to the ground. The amendment that I proposed to offer, for I did not offer it in committee, would, if agreed to, have changed the whole scope of the treaty and would have provided full commercial privileges to our fishermen.

The Senator proceeded further to say in the same speech:

> In its wild distress—

Referring to the party to which I belong—

> it thus addresses itself to the task of doing what it hopes will enable it to regain power by a united appeal to a supposed restless desire of our people for strife and war and to hold resentments towards Great Britain, recently intensified amongst our Irish population by the conduct of that government towards our friends in Ireland. The party that made this decree in its caucus, that this treaty should neither be amended nor ratified, feels the sad need of a new issue for its campaign.

I desire to repeat that there was no such caucus agreement, no such imposition on the rights of any Senator here, nor even any mention of an opposition to amendments being made to this treaty. On the contrary, the amendment I proposed, to which the Senator from Alabama probably referred, was spoken of in committee, and when I concluded not to offer it I gave the Senator from Alabama, first of all, the reasons why I did not press the amendment. I will explain that more fully hereafter. As to alleged desire on the part of the Republican party to change the issues of this campaign or to make any appeal to what is called the Irish vote, I consider that as merely a gratuitous remark made without any foundation whatever, so far as I know.

The great contest about to be waged before the people of the United States turns on other questions. They are the same old questions that have been presented for the last twenty years. First, the duty of Congress to protect the industries of this country from undue competition with the labor of Europe, and, second, the rights of persons, citizens of the United States, at home and abroad. These questions enter into the campaign and probably will control the result of the issue, and not any question such as this treaty taken up as a dernier ressort by the Republican party. The Republican party needs no such resort. It stands upon its record on the great issues that will be presented in this campaign, some of which will be explained more fully during this session.

Now let us go a little further. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] in alluding to this matter said:

> The consideration of the treaty in open session was a mandate of a party caucus in order that their appeal to the prejudices of voters against England might have its full force and produce the effect desired. To accomplish a partisan purpose the rules of this body requiring the consideration of treaties to be with closed doors, which have been in force from the beginning of the Government, have been suspended by caucus arrangement, not because the interest of the Government would be promoted thereby, but because it was supposed that party interests could be enhanced by a public tirade against a Democratic Administration for negotiating the treaty.

Here, again, my honorable friend from Delaware labored under a great mistake. There has been an honest difference of opinion on both sides of this Chamber as to the propriety of discussing treaties in open or in closed session. It has existed for at least ten years, and, strange to say, a large number of those on that side of the Chamber took the ground that treaties involving public interests, affecting the rights of the people of the United States, ought to be discussed in open session, and many Senators on that side have voted that way by the yea-and-nay vote on different divisions that have occurred in the last ten years. It is true that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] have been decidedly opposed to open sessions, and equally distinguished Senators on that side have been in favor of them, and have voted so and made speeches on that side. So of this side. Many of us have opposed what are called open sessions in regard to treaties, I among the rest, and the Senator from Vermont conspicuously so, while many Senators on this side have thought it best to have these matters discussed in open session.

Both parties have had their conferences on the subject and differed in the conferences just as they do on the floor of the Senate. But the prevailing opinion on this side of the Chamber (and it was decided when I was not present, I did not know of it except that it was communicated to me, but it accorded with my own opinion) that this treaty which affected intimately and distinctly the rights of citizens of the United States to exercise lawful employment on the ocean was a question that ought to be discussed in open session. It has been discussed openly in the British Parliament, discussed openly in the Canadian Parliament; and for us to hold our hands to our mouths and our mouths in the dust, refusing to give to the people of the United States some of the information which has been communicated to the people of Great Britain and Canada, giving the respective views of our people as represented on both sides of the Chamber, that it was important on this question at least, if not on all others, to make the debate open. And the result of that experiment (because it was an experiment) I think has been fruitful of good.

It is shown that even a treaty like this, which involves more or less of feeling, which relates to a controversy of some seventy years' standing, can be discussed in the Senate of the United States with dignity and decorum. I am glad to say so far in this debate it is properly printed for the information of the people, not only of the people of the United States, but of Canada as well, so that this experiment will probably be followed in other cases to the great advantage of the people of the United States. So far, therefore, as these alleged caucus conferences are concerned, they have had nothing to do with the merits of this treaty. They have not influenced a single vote, nor will they influence a single vote.

It is true that the divisions thus far had in the Senate show that on this side of the Chamber we believe with great unanimity and with great sincerity that this treaty is not a wise treaty, that it ought not to be approved, ratified, and confirmed; and I believe that instead of contributing to the peace of the two countries, it will raise new questions and new issues and embarrassments and create fresh ill feeling between the parties to it. There is no caucus domination in regard to it; no vote on this side of the Chamber will be influenced by any caucus decree for or against this treaty or any amendment of the treaty or to influence our action except only upon the question whether the debate shall be conducted openly in the eyes of the world or with closed doors.

Senators on that side have no more right to say that we are laboring under the influence of a caucus decree than we have to say they are afraid of an open discussion of this question because it will injure their party. I make no such intimation as that, but it would be just as proper for me to say, "You, gentlemen, are afraid to discuss this treaty." I do not say it, because it would be improper to say it, but the declaration that we are influenced by a caucus decree is just as far out of the record of this case as it would be for me to declare, "You are afraid to meet the issue before the American people." I do not believe that either declaration can be made true. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, let us go a little further. I do not intend to occupy your attention long in reference to this treaty, but to go at once to the point in controversy. When I entered into the consideration of this treaty it was a subject new to me, because I have not been very long a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Therefore, when the subject was first considered by us I certainly approached it with a desire to find in this treaty an honest and honorable settlement of a long-standing controversy with Great Britain. I regard such a controversy as infinitely more important, and infinitely more injurious, than with any other nation in the world; for, of all the peoples that now inhabit the globe, the people of the United States and the people of Great Britain are more intimately allied by every tie of consanguinity, of history, of faith, of institutions, of ancestry, of everything that tends to bind nations closely in friendship and good-will to each other. Hence, I would be glad to have seen in this treaty a settlement of the controversy, and I approached it with a desire to find in it such a settlement.

Nor have I any prejudice to gratify against the powerful nation from whom the great body of our people sprang. We have inherited from them most of our laws, institutions, literature, and social and domestic habits and traits of character, especially the stubbornness which refuses to yield territorial rights to any foreign power. My ancestors have shared for more than two centuries in the struggles of the past for American rights, but these have grown out of the natural differences between two kindred people separated by 3,000 miles, one standing on prescriptive rights of discovery and dominion, the other seeking to establish a government suited to their needs over a vast unoccupied territory, both animated with a love of liberty inherent in our race and lineage. No two countries have ever existed that have so many ties in common and between whom war and strife is more unnatural or more injurious to civilization and the progress of the human race.

The more I thought of this treaty, the more I examined its provisions, the more I became satisfied that it would open new causes of dispute and controversy, and that it would lead to more irritation, new difficulties in the region to which it relates. I became convinced it would not accomplish the desire that was proposed to be accomplished by negotiating it of settling the points in dispute between Great Britain and the United States.

I, too, have a strong desire to maintain the most cordial relations with the Dominion of Canada. Indeed, I look upon the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America as twin sisters, who have the same institutions, governed by the same ideas, lying alongside each other for 4,000 miles. It would be impossible to establish a bar sinister between these two peoples. Indeed, the history of Canada is becoming more and more interesting to us every day, as Canada is growing in strength and power and as the United States is increasing in population. We have that border of 4,000 miles. The people on one side of that border and on the other are precisely alike. You will find them there with the same descent, the same belief, of the same ideas, the same aspirations, the same interests, the same productions.

This is especially so with the State of Ohio and the Province of Ontario, which lies opposite us on Lake Erie and stretching along the border waters. The intercourse between Ontario and Ohio is as close as the intercourse between Kentucky and Ohio. Citizens of Ohio have large property interests in Canada. They have mines, they have quarries, they have large properties amounting to many millions of dollars. Our intercourse is of the closest character. We send them our coal, we send them our products. We exchange with them a vast multitude of things. They send to us their raw materials. To a large extent the intercourse between Ontario and Ohio is very much like the intercourse between two States of the Union; and I say here that I am willing and anxious to accomplish and bring about a public policy that will make more intimate the relations between the Dominion of Canada and the United States. All our interest is in that way, and nothing pulls us apart except the jealousy of local interests and the aspirations of leading men armed with titles in Canada. I say, therefore, that anything whatever that would tend to promote free commercial intercourse between these countries—yea, anything that will tend to produce a union of Canada with the United States of America—will meet my most hearty support.

We should look upon them as natural allies of the same race and origin, with whom it is our duty to cultivate all the arts of peace, and with whom I desire to establish the utmost commercial freedom and intercourse consistent with the interests of both. Especially is this so with the Province of Manitoba and all the provinces westward to the Pacific Ocean. They are separated from the eastern provinces by a great granite hump north of Lake Superior which is a difficult and barren waste, and valuable only for minerals, such as silver, copper, iron, and nickel.

Yes, sir, I want Canada to be part of the United States. Within ten years from this time, in my judgment, the Dominion of Canada will be represented either in the Imperial Parliament of Great Britain or in the Congress of the United States. And I say to Senators on both sides that I hope that that representation will be in the Congress of the United States, and that those countries up there so interesting to us and bound to us by so many ties may be part of the great English-speaking republic of America, dominating this whole continent with the exception of that part which is peopled by the Spanish and Mexican races. That is my idea.

I have traveled through a vast extent of that country, almost every part of it, and I would favor a policy to bring about international exchanges of the freest character possible, perhaps something in the nature of a zollverein to relieve us from establishing a line of custom-houses and fortifications along the border.

It would be the height of nonsense, it would be almost a crime against our civilization for us to build forts to protect ourselves from Great Britain on the Canadian border, or for them to build forts to protect themselves from encroachments by the United States. Long before that time comes the good sense of these two peoples, bound by so many ties, will mingle with each other, having a common heritage and a common government. That is the feeling with which we should approach the consideration of the treaty, and that is my feeling to-day. Therefore I shall not be expected to say anything in regard to Canada but what is kind and just and proper.

I do not vote against this treaty because it may possibly bring about this condition of affairs, but I shall vote against it because I believe it tends to erect a barrier and to prevent the very objects that are sought to be accomplished.

Now, sir, I wish to say further in this disclaimer (because I am answering the arguments made on the other side) that I do not regard this as a party question. Although from the votes on this treaty it may be considered so, it is because Senators on the other side of the House are departing from the declarations that they have made heretofore on this subject; it is because Senators on that side of the House are controlled more or less by party ties in supporting this treaty because it is a treaty made by a Democratic administration.

They can answer each for himself whether that influences his conduct. On this side of the Chamber we are not influenced by the fact that the treaty was made by a Democratic administration or that it was negotiated by Mr. Bayard. On the other hand, if the treaty had given to us those rights which I believe ought to be secured by treaty, I should have voted for it with the greatest pleasure, and I should have given Mr. Bayard and this Administration whatever credit there was in bringing about a treaty that would solve this difficulty and promote our commercial relations.

It is therefore not a party question in any sense. Senators talk about us as making this a party question. I might as well turn around to them and say that the Democratic party is now in alliance with the Tory party of England in order to break down our industrial interests and carry out their ideas of free trade. That would be just as proper an argument as was made by my friend from Delaware. Suppose I should say that the Democratic party, claiming especially to be the party of the people, was seeking an alliance with the Tory party in England; that it is extolled now by the London Times and the Tory party in England; and that this treaty and their policy of free trade is an evidence of such an alliance with the Tory party in Great Britain.

No nation is more interested than Great Britain to break down the barriers which we have erected by our tariff laws against inundating our country with the products of foreign lands. Therefore nearly all parties in England would be in favor of any measure which would tend to bring about free trade in fish and to establish a precedent of free trade on our northern border.

I might therefore denounce the Democratic party in the ordinary language of the party papers and the stump by saying that it was in alliance with those who have always been opposed to the history, and growth, and power, and progress of the United States of America, and who are seeking now to break down the American policy in order to build up and supplant it with the English policy. I do not do that, because I know the hearts of Senators on the other side beat just as strongly to the impulses of patriotism and against any influence from foreign domination or foreign influence as we on this side. I do not think that argument is necessary, but it is just as potent and just as true as the declaration now made that we regard this as a party question and take our course on this subject in order to defeat a measure of a Democratic Administration. I do not regard it in that light.

Nor is that all. I do not regard this as a sectional question. Senators on that side have spoken on this subject, treating it as if it related only to the fishermen of Gloucester town or a few ports along the New England coast, and that they are unreasonable in involving us in a national controversy. This is not a sectional controversy; it is not a New England controversy; it is an American controversy. The greatest American statesmen from the North, the South, the East, and the great West in all the long period of our history when this subject has been brought up have stood shoulder to shoulder upon this question as an American question, a question of the rights of American citizens.

Do not the merits of this treaty affect just as much all the fishermen along the Southern coast and the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean as the fishermen of New England? There are provisions of this treaty, including the fifteenth article, so wide-reaching that if adopted they would in their consequences open the ports of the Southern States to every Canadian vessel that chose to come into your ports to fish in your waters. It would open all that vast fishery on the Pacific, infinitely more valuable than the Newfoundland fishery has ever been, to the depredations of people from British Columbia. It would open up controversy there. It is just as important to the people of Ohio as to any other, although we have few fishermen there and do not care who furnish our fish. We let the Canadian fishermen come down into our waters and catch fish wherever they choose.

Nor does this treaty turn upon the mode of negotiation. My friend from Alabama has got up a hobby, if he will allow me to use that phrase, a moot question, as to whether this treaty could be negotiated by two men who had never been confirmed by the Senate of the United States. I believe in one of his speeches he made the remark that the Committee on Foreign Relations refused to take that view of the question, and did not wish to make any point at all upon the mode or manner in which this negotiation was set on foot. They expressly declined to do it, and therefore in the report that is made——

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator that he is quite mistaken about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; if I am mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will consult the report of the minority of that committee he will see that they took just the opposite ground from that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know myself that I never took that view of it. When the report of the majority was presented it did not contain that declaration except merely arguendo.

As to the powers of the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty, I agree with everything that has been said upon that subject. The President of the United States has the power to propose treaties, subject to ratification by the Senate, and he may use such agencies as he chooses to employ, except that he can not take any money from the Treasury to pay for those agents without an appropriation by law. He can use such instruments as he pleases. He can take any kind of a man, a dumb man, a blind man, or a deaf man. In my judgment he has a right to use such means as are necessary to bring about any treaty. I suppose that precedents have been quoted by the Senator from Alabama to sustain that position. I do not disagree with him, nor does this controversy turn upon that point.

We are not debating here whether the treaty was negotiated exactly as some other treaties have been nogotiated, by ministers plenipotentiaries appointed and confirmed by the Senate. That is not the question which has been presented on this side of the Chamber; it is whether the treaty as it stands is a wise solution of the difficulty between Great Britain and the United States. That is the question, and we are not to be diverted from it.

My friend from Alabama chooses, as he did the other day, to make a long argument upon this point. What is the use of it? It is an immaterial issue. I do not say that he does it to divert our attention, because I think he knows that we are not to be diverted by that moot question of his. He may discuss it now or at any future time to his heart's content, and I should be disposed on the whole to agree with him, only that has no more to do with this debate than the demonstration of the forty-seventh problem of Euclid or any other outside proposition.

It is true (and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] used it only in that way) that as this treaty was negotiated in an unusual manner, not through the ordinary chosen representatives of the Government to conduct its foreign relations, but through other gentlemen called from private life to give their advice and to participate in the negotiation and to sign the treaty, it is unusual. So far as any argument may be based upon that, it can be used, and very properly used, on this side of the Chamber, but it is not the material question upon which this controversy turns, and I therefore dismiss it.

Nor is this an Irish question. The Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Delaware seem to think it is an Irish question, and that we are fishing for Irish votes. Nothing is more unfounded than that. I believe there is a general sympathy with the people of Ireland, not only here in the Senate Chamber, but among all the people of the United States of America—a general sympathy in their struggle for home rule. Who does not share in that? I certainly do, and I have expressed it on every proper occasion.

I hope and trust that the Irish in the controversy may gain from the Parliament of Great Britain the right to pass all local laws; that they may be put in the same position at least with the States of the Union, and that all matters of local ascertainment may be dealt with by the Irish people in an Irish Parliament. Who does not think that should be done?

I saw a remark quoted from Mr. Chamberlain, a gentleman of great ability, who negotiated this treaty, that the leading men of this country were opposed to this Irish demand. He is greatly mistaken. I could take the poll of the Senate upon that question and there is scarcely a man here who would not give a hearty "yea" to the strongest appeal which could be made to the people of Great Britain to give to the Irish home rule as we understand it.

I believe that is the general sentiment; but we are not going to war about that. We are not going to involve ourselves in controversies with Great Britain in regard to a matter over which we have no power. The hope of the Irish people to get home rule is through the Liberal party of England. It is through the workingmen of England. It is through the great statesmen Harcourt, Gladstone, and the other gentlemen who have contributed their abilities and have risked a great deal in advocating home rule. They must win this great right for Ireland by the consent of the British Parliament, because it is perfectly idle for them to hope to attain it in any other way.

I believe, with the concurring sentiment that is now going on, there will be a solution of this question by the Parliament of Great Britain in due course of time, by which the people of Ireland shall be again, as they were for centuries, armed with home rule, with the power to pass all laws that do not affect the integrity and power and strength of the British Empire.

But the Irish people must not attempt to carry on their controversy by dynamite, by unlawful processes, for whenever they do they lose that sympathy which springs from the heart of every American citizen. The means which strike at the innocent, the wife, the children, the women, and endanger the lives of whole bodies of people merely to express their resentment against the ruling power in England is not an American idea; it is not an English idea; it is not an Irish idea, and wherever it occurs on this continent or any other the voice of remonstrance will cry out against it.

That was shown most markedly in Chicago, where the dynamite policy was adopted by what are called anarchists, where they threw bombs which killed the innocent and the guilty, if there were any guilty, in attempting to enforce the laws. The sentiment of reprobation has gone so far as to condemn and execute men guilty of that crime, and I trust that feeling will prevail all over the United States of America. When any party or set of men resort to lawless means of redress for real or imaginary wrongs and involve the innocent as well as the guilty in their controversy, the Anglo-Saxon is against him wherever he may live, in this country or in Great Britain. The true friends of Ireland do not appeal to such agencies.

Something was said about arbitration here. We have many petitions on our tables praying for what we granted here the other day in a resolution favoring arbitration as a means of settling international controversies. We have a petition signed by over two hundred members of the English Parliament, among them nearly all of that band of Irish respresentatives who are seeking home rule, and that prayer was for precisely what we granted. Therefore, it can not be said that they favor any lawless methods. All we propose in respect to Irish rule is to express in a manly way our sympathy with the Irish in their peaceable and lawful efforts to acquire home rule or the right to govern themselves, and in justice I feel bound to say that this sentiment is shared not only almost universally by Republicans, but I believe it is shared by Democrats, and that my friend from Alabama would be as earnest in expressing the desire I have expressed as I can possibly be. So it is not confined to either side of the Chamber.

Nor have I any sympathy in what is called Anglophobia, and in abuse of the British power and the British Government. Whatever may be said of the British power and the British Government, it has been the most potent element of civilization in modern history. Undoubtedly their system is different from ours, but in all the great march of progress of the human race, the English people and the English power have always taken the lead. If we do our part as well as they in the great advance of civilization and progress, in the development of countries, we shall certainly do our share. Fortunately for us our efforts in that direction are continental; they are limited within vast and extensive bounds which until recently have been sparsely populated, and our energies in spreading our civilization have been confined to our own country. But the English civilization has gone beyond that little island, and has spread itself around the world, and although sometimes it has been wrong and cruel in its measures, yet their civilization has contributed to the progress of the world more than any other cause now known.

Sir, I do not want to see our country involved in any of the controversies of European nations. There is no passage of General Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States that is more eloquent and more forcible, now and then, warning the people of America from regarding foreign nations either with enmity or special favor than the short paragraph which I shall quote. It is only a single sentence from that great document, which ought to be circulated like the Declaration of American Independence, the Ordinance of 1787, and the Constitution of the United States as among the great and admirable documents of American history. General Washington said:

> Nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is, in some degree, a slave.

And so it is the case. Therefore we must treat Great Britain not with prejudice growing out of the Revolutionary contest or the war of 1812, but we must treat her as we do all other nations, enemies in war, in peace, friends. That is the desire I have in dealing with this treaty, to treat Great Britain as a friendly nation without reviving any of the animosities and warfare of the past.

I suppose I share with others the memory of the past and can find many things in British history to complain of, but I should be ashamed of myself if I could not dismiss the heat of those old contests of the past hundred years in considering a treaty between Great Britain and the United States.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the real question between Great Britain and the United States as it appears upon this treaty. At first it must be said that our right to the Newfoundland fishery, that is, on the outside of the territorial jurisdiction of Canada, is as broad and unquestioned as our right to the soil of Ohio or to the soil of Massachusetts. That was acceded to us, not as a privilege granted to us, but as a right to be enjoyed, and it has always been so regarded and it has never been denied by Great Britain. Let us look at that.

The third article of the treaty of 1783 declares:

That the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish.

Here is an acknowledgment of a right, not conferring a privilege, but an acknowledgment of a right. Great Britain has always held that position in regard to it. However, there were also by that treaty conferred upon us certain privileges which we had no right as an independent nation to demand, but which was a matter of reciprocal obligation conceded to us as a matter of privilege and liberty on the shores of Great Britain. What is the language in which that was expressed? It is very different indeed. The third article of the treaty of 1783 proceeds:

And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island), and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

This was plainly a matter of concession, not a matter of right, because we could not claim the use of the shores of another country except as a matter of concession and treaty obligation. But it is here expressed in the strongest possible terms. That this distinction between these provisions has always been made is shown very clearly by the declaration made not only in the time of but before the treaty of 1818. Lord Bathurst, in a letter to Mr. Adams, found in the American State Papers, October 30, 1815, makes the line of distinction very broad. He says:

In the third article Great Britain acknowledges the right of the United States to take fish on the banks of Newfoundland and other places, from which Great Britain has no right to exclude an independent nation.

Great Britain had usually before the Revolutionary war asserted the right of supremacy and domination of the seas to an extent that no other nation in the world ever asserted, but when they came to deal with America they acknowledged the right of the United States to fish on all the open-sea fisheries, which Great Britain had no right to exclude from any nation whatever. Lord Bathurst goes on to say:

But they are to have the liberty to cure and dry them in certain unsettled places within His Majesty's territory.

He there draws the distinction.

Mr. PLATT. He uses the word "liberty" again.

Mr. SHERMAN. He uses the word "liberty." Liberty, or license, or privilege, may all be called synonymous terms. Not only was this observed, but after the treaty of 1818 and at a recent date the same distinction is drawn by the British negotiators.

Our rights on the sea are as broad as the sea and as wide as the sea. We ask nothing from Great Britain in regard to our fishery rights there. We would assert them if necessary with all the power which we possess; but we need not assert them, because Great Britain concedes them, and they have never been denied.

The only restriction which has been made was made by the treaty of 1818. Though we may abuse that treaty and criticise it as much as we please, and say that it was the exercise of the power of Great Britain when she was in her haughtiest mood after she had overthrown Napoleon, Great Britain then more than at any other time asserted herself and was unjust, no doubt, to other nations. She showed the egotism of a proud and imperious nation in her negotiations in those times. When she came to negotiate with America she did modify to some extent, but not to any very material extent, the privileges conferred upon the United States in respect to the shore fisheries on her coasts of Newfoundland and that immediate region.

We must be governed by that treaty. We are not a child or a woman to complain that advantage was taken of us. We must stand by the terms of that treaty, because we agreed to it. Although we were then in no condition to fight for more, and in no condition to demand of Great Britain all that was conceded by the treaty of peace, yet we did make, as the Senator from Massachusetts demonstrated, a good treaty, substantially securing all the rights conferred by the treaty of peace. We probably won by our diplomacy in 1818 more than Great Britain would have conceded to any other nation in the world, because she was then haughty and powerful and dominant on land and on sea.

In the letter of the Earl of Iddesleigh of the 30th of November, 1886, in the papers communicated to us, there is this declaration, showing exactly that the distinction which I made between ocean fisheries and the shore fisheries was kept up by the treaty of 1818:

The privileges manifestly secured to United States fishermen by the convention of 1818 in Newfoundland, Labrador, and the Magdalen Islands are not contested by Her Majesty's Government—who, whilst determined to uphold the rights of Her Majesty's North American subjects, as defined in the convention, are no less anxious and resolved to maintain in their full integrity the facilities for prosecuting the fishing industry on certain limited portions of the coast which are expressly granted to citizens of the United States.

That is the open fishery—

Therefore in treating this question we stand upon the treaty of 1818. What we want and what we demand is the rights conferred by that treaty; not one iota less. Nor can we with any justice or sense of manhood demand anything more.

Mr. President, when you come to consider this treaty the whole controversy between Great Britain and the United States turns upon what is called the renunciation clause of the first article of the treaty of 1818. That clause is very short, and in that clause is the bundle of all the troubles in which our country has been involved in the last seventy years in controversies about these fisheries. I will read it, and any Senators who will listen to me will please note that there are three distinct propositions made here.

The United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

That is, that we renounce our right to take, dry, and cure fish within certain defined regions, which we had the right to exercise under the treaty of peace. That is the first renunciation, and that brings in the question of bays, harbors, etc. The first controversy that rises between us is what is a bay, what is a harbor, what is a creek? There is one of the leading controversies between the two countries. The next clause is quite distinct from that:

Provided, however, That the American fishermen shall be admitted to enter such bays or harbors for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

That is, it defines the uses we could make of the waters within the shore-line. We had a right to seek shelter in any of the bays, in any of the harbors within the 3 miles limit anywhere; there is no doubt about that; but the objects for which this privilege was sought were confined to "shelter, repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever." That is the second clause which gave rise to many of the controversies. The third clause in the same paragraph (for this bundle of troubles was all put in a single paragraph) reads:

But they shall be under such restriction as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein—

That is, within the 3 miles, the marine league, and the bays—or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

This last clause has been the chief cause of all the controversies growing out of the local troubles up in that fishery region, because the Canadian authorities, governed by local ideas, ruled and dominated by local fishermen or by the influence of local fishermen—those interested in this business—were allowed by the imperial power of Great Britain to make laws which are offensive to us, and to enforce them in a way that I wonder heretofore has not often created trouble and difficulty. Indeed, no man can read the story of the wrongs growing out of the execution of local laws in that region without feeling a sense of indignation, and I only wonder that many a gun had not been fired by the opposing vessels, and many a mortal combat had not been brought about by the offensive application of these most odious laws.

Upon these three clauses turn the whole controversy. Now, let us look at them. They are, I repeat, first, the privilege to take and cure fish within 3 miles of certain shores and bays; second, to enter bays and harbors for shelter, to repair damages, for wood and water, and no other purpose; third, under such restrictions as may be necessary, etc.

Now, take the first clause. What do the words "coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" mean? As to the word "coasts" there can be no doubt, because the limit is expressly defined by the treaty within the marine league, and therefore we have just as much right to fish outside of that marine league as any fishermen of Canada or Great Britain. We hold that right under the Almighty God, who makes the sea open, according to our construction and according to the British construction as well. As I have shown you, before the treaty of 1818 and after the treaty of 1818, they admit in the broadest terms our unquestioned right to fish anywhere beyond these delimited waters. There can be no controversy about that.

Now, what is a bay? Was it intended by the language of the treaty of 1818 to mean such a bay as the Chesapeake Bay or Boston Bay or the Bay of Fundy or the Bay of Chaleurs, the great waters? No; it is manifest upon the face of the papers that the word "bays" here was used in connection with harbors, creeks, and coasts, and by a fair construction of the language of that treaty a bay would be defined by the same line of limit as the coast. A bay more than 6 miles or 2 marine leagues wide would naturally be excluded so far as it lay outside of that limit. If the mouth of the bay were only 6 miles wide, then, as a matter of course, the waters were delimitated; but could it be possible, taking this language with its context, that a bay should include vast regions of open sea water?

I believe the whole theory of the treaty and a fair construction of it was in this direction. A bay was an inclosed water 3 miles from center to shore, and by no fair construction between equal peoples could this meaning be extended beyond that. Therefore, as a matter of right, I believe that we have just as much right to fish in the bays outside of the 3-mile limit as we have anywhere else.

Still this was a subject of controversy, and besides it has been made a subject of negotiation. We have ourselves negotiated for the extension of the shore-line to 10 miles, I am told, down in the Gulf of Mexico. We have ourselves negotiated for an extension of the marine league. Great Britain, in making treaties with the North German nations, with Denmark, with Sweden, with Russia as to the Baltic Sea and as to the English Channel, has adopted a new line of demarkation. Instead of the old marine league, which was the law then, and indeed is the law of nations laid down by Vattel and all the books on the law of nations, as the measure which any nation might assert its power over for its own defense, they have enlarged that in some cases to 6 miles, in some cases to 10 miles by treaties with foreign nations, on the ground that the great improvements in gunnery, fortifications, and the like have made it necessary to command an adjacent sea wider than the marine league.

Therefore, if this was a mere matter of negotiation as to the boundaries of a bay, or whether certain bays ought not to be delimited by a certain line so as to confer local jurisdiction, that is a matter two friendly nations ought to sit down and reason about. But, remember that every foot of sea granted by the United States outside of a marine league is in excess of the rights stipulated for by Great Britain by the express terms of the treaty. It was our right to go within 3 miles, and if they demanded of us or appealed to us to extend that line they were bound to give us an equivalent, to give some concession to correspond with it, and then the Government of the United States might properly treat upon the extension of the marine league.

Now, that is the view I took of it. Therefore, when this treaty was under consideration and the delimitation of these great bays had been provided for by the terms of the treaty, I could see that it might be wise in certain bays to extend local jurisdiction to 6 miles or 10 miles from the shore.

There is one provision in the treaty by which we extend local jurisdiction where the mouth of the bay is 10 miles wide, and there was no great objection made to that rule, although it was a concession, a grant of water over which we had the unquestioned right by the law of nations and by the treaty stipulation. But when they undertook to extend local jurisdiction and exclude us from these great bays or to enforce practically their headland idea they then trenched upon the rights conceded to them by the treaty, and we have always stood up against that.

The whole line of negotiations from 1818 to this time shows that this was resisted, and several cases occurred, one in the Bay of Fundy and one in another bay the name of which I do not now remember. There were two cases, and we always insisted that the marine league should be observed in those bays. When they set up the headland doctrine it was at once resisted and was finally abandoned by Great Britain.

When our negotiators entered their room here in the city of Washington to treat upon this subject, every inch they gave outside the marine league or outside of a bay over 6 miles wide they conceded something for which there ought to have been an equivalent.

When, therefore, the first ten articles were considered in committee I was disposed to say, "I do not care so much about the delimitations of those bays." It had been rather conceded that they were not very valuable for our fishermen; but what is the concession given to us in return for them? Then it was that I proposed, in order to cure this matter, to propose a concession by Great Britain, and I prepared an amendment, which I fortunately have preserved, and is as follows:

ARTICLE XV.

All vessels of the United States, whether engaged in ordinary commerce or in the lawful pursuit of outside fishing shall have the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland free of charge for the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
3. Shipping of crews.

Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

The like privileges shall be continued or given to fishing vessels of Canada and of Newfoundland on the Atlantic coasts of the United States.

The Senator from Alabama will know very well that I suggested whether if we agreed to this delimitation of the bays, which I did not regard as the most important matter, which was a concession on our part, we ought to have at least commercial privileges for our fishing vessels in all the region which was thus delimited, including the 3-mile limit and the bays.

If the treaty had been based upon that condition without introducing into it the free-trade notions involved in the fifteenth article, there might have been a basis of honorable agreement; but instead of that, when we come to look at the concessions made to us for the surrender of all that vast region of water, plainly subject to our rights of fish, those concessions were ridiculous in the last degree. I do not see how Senators can look over Articles X, XI, XII, and XIII and call them concessions to us. They are the mere grants of the ordinary rights of humanity which are conceded by every nation in the world, that no excessive bail shall be taken; that the forfeiture shall not extend beyond the vessel and its cargo; that no unreasonable delay shall be had, and all that sort of thing.

The concessions offered by this treaty on the delimitation of those bays are a disgrace to the diplomacy of America. If they had demanded when the concessions were made full commercial rights for all our fishing vessels to enter their ports, to transship their cargoes, to buy food and supplies and bait and everything that was necessary—in other words, to put us in the delimited waters upon the same rights they enjoy themselves and the same rights which every fishing vessel in the world enjoys in the United States, it seems to me that that would be an arrangement honorable to our country.

I assure you such a provision should have been made in the treaty, confining it simply to the delimitation of certain bays and the extension here and there of the line of the marine league to 10 miles or to 5 miles, coupled with a proposition to give us commercial rights such as we give to all nations of the world, such as Great Britain gives to all he nations of the world, because there is no vessel, fishing vessel or other, but what can enter the harbors and ports of Great Britain free without any tolls or charges except those which are inflicted on their vessels. But there was no such provision, and here, in my judgment, the American commissioners fell short of their duty.

But it was said I did not press the amendment. I told the Senator from Alabama, with the frankness which ought to exist among members of the committee, first of all, and I believe he was the only one I told, that if I pressed that amendment it would not be agreed to by the other contracting parties, and he said he thought so, too. I said it would not be agreed to; that it would be only an indirect way to defeat the treaty, and I thought the most manly way was to defeat it directly by an open vote, leaving this question open for future negotiation; if by this Administration, re-elected, let it open the question and see if we can not make better terms; if, however, by another administration, more impressed with the rights of American citizens, then it would have a chance to negotiate.

As to making a pretense of war out of this disagreement as to the concessions that should be made for the delimitation of bays that were clearly within our treaty rights, sir, it is utterly idle and puerile to talk about it. Great Britain will never seek war on such a ground as that.

When you come to examine the subsequent clauses of the treaty in connection with the first ten sections you find nothing received in return except that which according to the language used in the Canadian Parliament with a sneer, that nobody would hardly complain of such concessions. So it was treated by Mr. Tupper, one of the negotiators, that all these concessions were such as would be conceded on the ground of humanity.

So the result of the treaty thus far is to delimit and cut our fishermen off from great masses of water along the coasts and bays of that region from rights that are clearly conferred upon them by the former treaty, and it gives us a husk, a straw, a corn-cob without anything on it, the promise of civilities like not confiscating anything but the vessel and all on board of her.

If they had put in the fifteenth section a provision conferring commercial privileges, defined even and limited as they are, without that provision about free trade, then there might have been some basis for an agreement. But nothing of that kind was done.

To have insisted upon the amendment proposed by me would have weakened our country in future negotiations by conceding the delimitation of the bays, while if the treaty was rejected it left open to our representatives every ground or claim held before the treaty was made. When the negotiators come again to meet and discuss this matter they will see that when we make concessions we demand concessions; that when we give up vast regions to the exclusive use of Canadian fishermen where we have an equal right with them, they shall give us such commercial privileges as will enable us to enter their ports. Not only that, but there is at Halifax an American railroad, owned by Americans, built by Americans, and we can not go inside of Halifax Harbor and there ship our fish to our own country for consumption because they exclude our fishing vessels from their ports; they will not let us go there. That is the view I have taken of this treaty.

As for the fifteenth section, I never will surrender to Great Britain or to any nation in the world our right to levy taxes on imported goods. Why should all the articles mentioned in the fifteenth article be admitted free of duty while we tax wheat, corn, sugar, rice, food, clothing, and everything else? Why should we, as an act of humility, give this privilege to these fishermen, because after all it is a local interest, and Great Britain only represents a local interest in this controversy? Why should we give this privilege of free entry of all their productions into our ports when we deny it, from the necessity of revenue and also from the necessity of protection to our industries, to all the food and clothing and necessaries of life? The fifteenth article standing as it is is an insult to us.

Why did Great Britain, or rather Canada (for Great Britain was a mere outside factor in this negotiation), refuse us the ordinary privileges besides shelter and repairing damages and purchasing wood and obtaining water? Our vessels could not buy coal. Mr. Bayard and Mr. Phelps complained of these restrictions over and over again in language as strong as I could use, and more so. Why did they not stand by their words when framing this treaty and demand the extension of these privileges when they were extending the boundaries of the British Empire?

Yet every singte inch was denied them. When they demanded coal, no, wood was mentioned. When they demanded bait, no, bait was not mentioned, "that would enable your fishermen to compete with ours; we will concede no privileges whatever unless you give us the absolute open market of your sixty million people for all our production, and then armed as we would be with the advantages of our position, of our locality, of our shore sea fisheries we would drive the fishing crews of New England from the coast," and the same effect will in due time happen on the South Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast.

They gave us the promise of shelter, and yet they denied us shelter, because if our vessels were driven in by a storm, which may last three or four days, we would be compelled to leave in twenty-four hours or report to a far-off custom-house, perhaps twenty miles away.

Sir, I do not think there is in the history of diplomacy so one-sided a treaty, especially made between two great and powerful nations. We are not in a condition to submit to such terms. With no provision, no coal, no seines, no bait, with no right to transship a cargo, they make their shores an inhospitable coast. Like the gates of the Inferno, "who enters here leaves hope behind."

So our fishermen driven for shelter find no welcoming hand, no ready assistance, but must be driven out within twenty-four hours from this inhospitable coast in order to give the Canadian fishermen the command not only of their market (for if it was confined to that it would be different), but the command of the whole market of the United States. Such a treaty as that seems to me to be disgraceful to our diplomacy. I use the word perhaps too strongly; but certainly it is the most unfortunate concession which could be made by any administration, and I deeply regret that Mr. Bayard ever signed his name to the paper.

Now, what are the privileges conferred upon us? When driven into a bay by a storm we are not bound to pay compulsory pilotage. People are not very apt to look for a pilot when they are driven by a storm anywhere. I do not think there is much concession in that. But, storm or no storm, they must not remain over twenty-four hours. When they are crippled they may land their cargo, but they can not buy provisions, they can not do anything except to provide for the home voyage and go back to Massachusetts or Maine to get fresh supplies to again engage in their lawful occupation in the open-sea fisheries.

Where is there in the diplomacy of modern nations anything like this? In ancient times nations kept their shores land-locked. When the treaty of 1818 was made no foreign vessels could enter the ports of the British colonies under any circumstances whatever except under stress of weather, and they had to get out as soon as possible. They were subject then to whatever lawless force was thought to be necessary to expel them. Since that time by the commercial regulations of 1830 hard conditions were modified by the consensus of both nations. General Jackson issued his proclamation allowing all vessels to enter our ports, and from that time to this our ports, harbors, creeks, and bays have been as open to the vessels of all nations as to our own. Great Britain also in more limited and careful language opened her ports to the vessels of all nations, only excepting this Canadian region.

While our fishermen had privileges in 1818 which were not enjoyed by other vessels, by the mutual legislation in 1830 they were placed clear in the background and denied all the privileges conceded to all other vessels and sailors. A vessel might go in there for timber, or lumber, or wheat, or corn, or supplies, but a fishing vessel catching fish there in the open sea, where our countrymen had just as much right as they have to the soil of Ohio, when driven by stress of weather were treated as outlaws, and seized not only for fishing within the 3-mile limit, but seized for preparing to fish, and for all sorts of fancied crimes.

Mr. President, such a treaty is not satisfactory to the Senate of the United States. It is not satisfactory to the people of the United States. I assure you, gentlemen, if you think this dissatisfaction is confined alone to the people most largely interested in this controversy you are greatly mistaken. Whenever the people of Ohio and of the West get to understand this matter—and they are going to understand it very well by this open debate—they will approve the course we have taken in regard to it, and I do not believe your constituents will approve the course you take in regard to it.

Mr. President, there is only one more feature of the treaty to which I wish to allude, and that is the fifteenth section. This I regard as a Siamese twin to what is called the Mills bill, and they ought to be debated together, the Mills bill being framed in accordance with this treaty, which, it is well known, will never be ratified by the Senate. All the privileges conferred by the treaty are given to the Canadian fishermen without any benefits whatever in return. If you want free fish American fishermen can furnish them, and we could furnish them at a much lower rate if Canadian policy would allow an American railroad to carry the fish from Halifax to Maine on the same terms that it carries Canadian fish from Halifax to Maine. As for surrendering our power to levy duties as long as we deem it our public policy, as I said before, I will never agree to that.

We may consider this treaty as a simple supplement to the Mills bill. Although the Mills bill was passed since the negotiation of the treaty, it is in pursuance of a line of public policy to which the Democratic party is being more and more committed daily, which would surrender all the great interests of our country to undue competition with foreigners.

Suppose you apply the principle of the fifteenth article to all goods from abroad, and why should you discriminate in favor of fish rather than other kinds of food? Why should you discriminate in favor of whale-oil rather than in favor of sugar and other articles that we tax? No reason can be given.

So the first part of the treaty is a surrender of plainly guarantied and treaty-given rights, without any consideration whatever; but it is more than that. It is a surrender to this hostile local population of an advantage worth millions of dollars a year to them, to the destruction of our fishermen, for how can our people take fish from seas about 600 miles away from home and compete with free fish and free oil of Canadian fishermen who can land within a few miles and carry their catch by railroad into our market? They can not do it. You destroy this great industry, this nursery of seamen, as it has been properly called.

Sir, these articles are the last that should be put upon the free-list, except only upon one condition. When the good time shall come when the people of the Dominion of Canada and our own shall blend their two systems into one harmonious republic, to be represented alike here and to enjoy here all the blessings and bear alike all the burdens of partnership, then we may admit fish and fish oil free from the Canadian Dominion as we do from all our other possessions; but until then we can not afford to do it without destroying our own home industry.

Mr. President, there is another bugbear which has been mentioned by the Senator from Alabama. He does not say that we are going to have war about this matter, but he intimates it very strongly in several remarks that he made. He wants to know what we will do. "Suppose the Republican party should come into power, what would you do?" is the substance of the question he asks. We will send politely to the British Government our plenipotentiary to communicate to that Government in the kindest and freest manner our discontent with the abortive agreement made by Mr. Bayard. He will state respectfully the grounds of our difference, that while we are willing to make concessions as to Great Britain's local jurisdiction along her coast to meet the changed ideas of the times, yet we want for those concessions and that surrender privileges which she grants to all the people of the world except to the fishermen of the United States.

I should like to see any British Government resist such a demand as that. There might be complaint from Nova Scotia or from Newfoundland or from the fishermen along that coast, but let the people of England and the United States have the proposition presented that we will yield to them in all their reasonable demands about local jurisdiction so as to give them the same command over their bays that we have over the Chesapeake Bay, upon the condition that our fishermen shall enjoy the rights of all other commercial vessels to enter her ports, transship their cargoes, do with it as they please, and be placed upon the same footing in that respect as the Canadian fishermen, and I do not believe that a ministry could stand a month in England in denying so reasonable a proposition as that.

England is now demanding free trade with all the world. She has opened her ports wide, and invites all the productions of all classes of mankind into her shore. Will they deny that same free trade to us when we catch fish in the ocean in exact pursuance of the rights conferred by our treaty and rights which we enjoy by the favor of Almighty God, when we bring from the coasts of Newfoundland our fishing vessels into her ports and she denies to them the same privileges which are enjoyed not only by all the people in this country, but by all people in Great Britain? No ministry in England could stand on that position, and I believe that if our Government had demanded commercial privileges such as our fishermen want, they would have been conceded. I read here a little paragraph from a fisherman which struck me as giving the exact statement of what they want. He says:

> What our fishermen want is the right to go anywhere and everywhere, use their harbors, ship men, get provisions, land and mend our nets, buy salt and barrels, and ship our catch home by rail or steamer without expense or annoyance, the same as we have heretofore.

They want the same rights that we give to Canadian fishermen now. In the port of Portland I have seen Canadian fishermen. I saw a lot of huts over on the island opposite the city, and I inquired who lived there. I was told Canadian fishermen. They come down there in the summer time to fish and catch fish in the bay and sell them at Portland, and then go back to Canada to winter. Yet they deny us the right to carry fish caught in the high seas through their bay into Halifax to our own railroad, to be shipped for our own use and consumption.

Mr. President, I would never sign a treaty with Great Britain unless there was something like reciprocity about it; but a treaty of surrender and concession from beginning to end, without securing any rights which are not denied except by a Hottentot or a barbarian in any land or in any clime, ought never to have been signed by an American representative. That is the view I take of it, under those circumstances, without any fear of the threat of war, which is the merest bugbear, which will not frighten any man or woman in this country, first, because we know it is ridiculous to suppose that war could grow out of a controversy of this kind, growing out of an honest difference of opinion as to the construction of a single clause of a treaty. I do not fear it at all.

Mr. President, having stated my position on this subject, I will yield the floor. I believe that the good sense of the people of Great Britain and the United States will settle this matter without much more controversy, without war, without contention. Any man who wants war in our day and generation is a lunatic. Any man who desires a war between Great Britain and the United States is a madman. These two nations, bound together by so many ties, will settle this controversy as they have settled many others.

Ever since the Revolutionary war to this hour we have had disputes with Great Britain, and sometimes pretty sharp and severe controversies and negotiations; and I say, except in the war of 1812, when Great Britain was seeking to dominate a continent in arms against her, we have made peace with England on honorable terms, conceding sometimes, as we thought, too much, but always so as to preserve the peace. No hand ought to be raised against this hopeful result; no voice should be raised against it; and if the controversy that is now to be carried to the people of the United States, not so much upon this treaty as upon the other great questions which I mentioned in the beginning of my remarks, should be decided by the people of the United States against this Administration, and if General Harrison should be elected President of the United States, as I most earnestly hope and believe he will be, you need not fear any war or any dangerous controversy out of the fisheries on the Northeastern coast.

It will be settled upon terms that will be honorable and peaceful and proper. I can not close my remarks better than by repeating the language uttered here only two years ago by my honorable friend from Alabama. All I ask of him is to stand by the declarations he then made, and we will have peace and quiet and safety. Here is a speech made by my friend, April 13, 1886, headed "No new treaty needed."

> I do not wish to volunteer any opinions about this subject before a question gets before the Senate, and I am compelled to act upon it; but my convictions are very strong; they are fixed. Indeed I may say that we can get along with the people of Great Britain on this subject without any further treaty at all and without any further legislation. If any one were to ask me what provisions of a treaty I would frame to compare and settle any question of fundamental law between us and Great Britain in respect to the fisheries, I could not suggest it, or if I were asked to propose an amendment to the statutes of the United States, so as to put the control of this intricate subject more completely in the hands of our Government, I would not know how to do it. I believe that both the treaty stipulations and the situations under the statutes are about as complete as we are able to make them.

So I say, now, if this treaty is rejected we stand where we stood in 1886, upon the existing treaty of 1818 and upon the law as it stands. If the President of the United States will only with wisdom exercise the powers conferred upon him by the law, and where Great Britain or any of her dependencies excludes our fishermen from the plain duties of hospitality, let him do the like to Canadian fishermen; if they say they will not sell coal to our vessels, let him say the same to the Canadian vessels; if they say they will not let us stay more than twenty-four hours in their ports without again encountering the terrors of the ocean, let him say the same to them; if they say they will not sell us cloth even to repair a sail swept away in a storm and he would say the same to them mildly but earnestly, there would not be long any trouble about this controversy.

The universal feeling of mankind would be that we had the right to measure out the same degree of hospitality to them that they do to us, not to go one inch beyond it, not to invade other matters and other controversies and create trouble among ourselves, but merely to give to them the same medicine that they give to us, so that the law of hospitality shall be mutual. Let not the action on one side be kindly and on the other side be harsh and repulsive.

This is what I supposed was meant by the law, that the President would be armed with such discreet power, to be discreetly exercised, as would enable him to prescribe for them the same rule they prescribe to us, and confine it to the same class of objects, not because they deny our fishermen rights of hospitality that we should deny the great sailing vessels that traverse the ocean the rights of hospitality, but deny to their vessels of the same grade the same rights to come here and fish in our waters, and it would not be long before the good sense of the people of England would see that that was not the proper way to conduct intercourse between two great and powerful nations of kindred blood.

A mere proposition of such mutual and reciprocal exchanges of compliment would be sufficient to bring about terms of peace and good neighborhood and good-will. I have no doubt that even yet, if Mr. Cleveland, as this treaty is, as he may as well consider it, dead, would pursue this course plainly marked out by the law, approved by my friend from Alabama, there need be no change of our treaty, no further changes of our laws, and these two great and powerful countries would float quietly and soberly into the haven of peace.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. STEWART. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] will, as I understand, be ready to-morrow morning to close this debate on our side; and therefore, at 1 o'clock to-morrow, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty, if the Senator from Ohio is not then present to do so. At the same time I wish to express a sincere desire that we may hasten this to a close, and I hope the Senator from Alabama, if he proposes to do it, will close the debate on that side, and let us have a vote on this subject.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not assume the right, at all, to limit any Senator on this side of the Chamber in discussing this very important subject at his will and pleasure. I understand that there are several Senators who have not made perhaps very elaborate or prepared effort on this treaty who desire to speak upon it, and I shall not undertake to limit their right to do so. I am willing to speak on this question whenever and wherever I think I can do any good, or can amuse my friends on the other side of the Chamber, but I do not propose to enter into any agreement about it. I have no right to do so.

Mr. FRYE. I am authorized, Mr. President, by those who are opposed to the ratification of this treaty to give notice that after to-morrow morning it will be pressed to a final vote.

Mr. MORGAN. It is proper that I should say in reply to that notice, that we have pursued and observed all proper diligence in this matter, believing that the issue presented here was one of very great magnitude to the country. We have a number of questions that we desire to raise on this treaty as it progresses. One Senator, I think, has a motion perhaps to recommit the treaty, on which I expect he would like to be heard somewhat extensively. We do not intend to obstruct the action of the Senate in the slightest degree, and have not done so at all.

We have extended every indulgence to the other side, especially when they have desired to go away, first the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], afterwards the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and others. We have given them all the time they desired to debate this question. I have had the misfortune myself to be out of the Senate for six or seven days during this debate on account of sickness, and so I did not have the opportunity to hear what was said about it during that time.

If there is any disposition on the other side to press it to a vote unduly or to extend the sessions until a vote can be obtained, I notify the other side that they can not do it. We shall be here to see that they do not take any rough advantage of us in this matter.

Mr. FRYE. There is no purpose or desire to take any advantage. This treaty has now been pending for a very long while in the Senate, and there is no earthly reason why any Senator who desires to speak should not have prepared himself to speak by this time. When I said that we proposed to press it to a final vote, I did not mean and do not mean to be understood as saying that I shall ask the Senate to sit it out to-morrow or the next day. But I mean to say that having entered upon the discussion to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to continue it to the exclusion of all other business until the discussion ceases.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, perhaps we shall not agree to that, either. I do not think we shall. There is plenty of other legislative business in the Senate besides this.

Mr. FRYE. That is rather what I expected—that they would not.

Mr. CALL. It is proper that I should say that while I did not propose to make any extended or elaborate observations on this treaty, it was my purpose to make a short address to the Senate upon it before its conclusion. I do not know whether I shall be prepared to do it to-morrow or not. I desire to give notice that I wish to be heard upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has moved that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I can hardly think that the Senator from Alabama can feel that any undue pressure is to be brought upon the closing of this debate. For several weeks it has, I believe, been understood upon each side of this Chamber—certainly it has been understood by the Senator from Alabama and myself—that on this side it was proposed that the close of the debate with us should be conducted by myself, and I understood (without any disagreement on the other side) that the close of the debate would be conducted by the Senator from Alabama. As to the time when, or the circumstances under which, that close of debate should take place, it is only necessary to watch the course of things to see, thus far, that every one has had an opportunity to speak, and to delay his speaking, without any objection of any kind on either side of the Chamber, as was the right and the propriety of the debate here.

I had expected, and so announced, that I hoped to be able to close the debate on Monday of last week, and I understood no objection was felt on the part of the Senator from Alabama that he would be ready to close, so far as that lot might fall to him, on the other side. There have been intervening speeches very properly, there have been on this side, and there have been on that side. And now, at least on our side, I believe there is no one proposing to address the Senate on this subject excepting myself. If others are desirous of speaking on the other side, I had desired that they should speak before I had closed on our side, the Senator from Alabama and the proposers of the adoption of the treaty having the general close. I am sure there is no disposition here to crowd any one regarding this matter.

If it shall be said that there are others who now wish to speak, I have no objection to speaking immediately after them to-morrow, or, if that carries the debate longer into the session than is desired, then on the succeeding day; but as the matter now stands I shall feel quite at liberty to say that the understanding of complete discussion on both sides is fairly enough reached now by its being closed on one side, and the other as is proposed. I shall therefore propose in the morning to close the debate upon our side.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to be indulged for a moment to say that the speech which has been delivered in the Senate to-day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is upon a plane so much higher and more statesmanlike than anything that has come from the other side of the Chamber since this debate has started, that I think it is only fair to say that we should have an opportunity to see the text of that speech in print before we are forced to go further in this debate.

The Senator from Ohio takes broad issue with his friends over there on many important features of this treaty. That is plain to everybody. I must say that I have perceived no inconsistency in the attitude of that Senator on this question, from the time that I first gathered an idea of his views. I expected just such a speech as he has made.

I should think that after that speech had been made, it is necessary on our side that we should make some explanations and some statements about this case that otherwise we should not have found it necessary to make at all. A few hours of examination should be allowed to enable us to do that.

I should like very much, indeed, that either the Senator from Delaware or myself would take the floor to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. So far as I am personally concerned, I have not discussed the merits of this treaty at all up to this time. I have avoided doing so. I have been trying to get out of the way some of the rubbish which the Senator from Ohio says is a moot question—a matter of no concern at all. Perhaps if we can agree about that we can get down to the merits of the treaty as it is before us without any further parley.

I wanted to speak of the modus vivendi in support of my proposition to postpone the further consideration of this treaty.

Mr. DAWES. That will soon pass away.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that will pass away soon. I have no doubt the Senator has a very anxious desire that it should, because it is breaking up the opinions of the fishermen in regard to the advantages of this treaty very rapidly, not less than 60 vessels having availed themselves of the license, that are now carrying on their fishing operations with great success and in perfect peace.

Mr. FRYE. And yet the Senator must know that almost the first one to take advantage of it was seized.

Mr. MORGAN. No, but seized for carrying bait or supplies of some kind from a Canadian port to a French vessel, backwards and forwards. I have not any doubt that as soon as this treaty has gone by the board we shall have a good many cases already manufactured, turned loose for the purpose of manufacturing opinion in this country, and I think if this debate should continue from now until Christmas it would be a great benefit to this people, so that as a matter of fact the fishermen could demonstrate to the country the advantages of a joint ownership of a fishery on the Atlantic coast.

I do think that there is not anything harder to arrange, anything more difficult of adjustment, than a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common in fisheries situated on the coast of Newfoundland, Labrador, Prince Edward Island, or wherever they may be; and whatever reasonable arrangement can be devised by which our fishermen and the Canadian fishermen can have a manner of proceeding provided by which they can keep the peace and still enjoy the riches of the seas in the yield of fish would be something that would attract the attention of this country, and the people of the United States would applaud us for not forcing conclusions when we are getting along so comfortably and peaceably as we are now.

I am quite aware—I have been aware all the time—that if this modus vivendi had not been established, or if the Government of Great Britain or the negotiators of this treaty had not tendered to us the modus vivendi, there would not have been such extreme anxiety to push this treaty overboard. Of course it is a conclusion that necessarily follows that if the treaty is defeated that concession on the part of the British Government would cease, and then would flare up again all the evils that have occurred under this treaty of 1818, such as have occurred every time that we have not had some accommodation, some arrangement with the British Government by which our fishermen could in peace and quietness enjoy the rights they have under the treaty of 1818.

I therefore prefer, if I can have the indulgence of the Senate, to submit a few remarks on that subject before I get to the main question of the treaty; for the question of the treaty, Mr. President, is one that stands by itself. It is a question of fundamental and organic law. It is the same sort of question that I was speaking about in the remarks that the Senator from Ohio quoted awhile ago, when I said I saw no difficulty so far as concerned fundamental or organic law between the United States and Great Britain. If that Senator had thought a moment he would not have quoted that against me as relating to these arrangements for fishing, which are not fundamental and do not enter into the organic law of the treaty, do not measure any right of the British Government or British citizen, but relate only to the measures and regulations in force and necessary for the peaceful, quiet, and orderly conduct of the fishing rights and fishing ventures in that quarter.

I say yet, as I have always said, that the organic law, the fundamental law as settled between the United States and Great Britain in the treaty of 1818 is a broad, plain, definite, and distinct arrangement. Some details were omitted; some are proposed to be added to it by an amendment in this treaty; some have been added to it by conciliation and concession, on two occasions at least—one at the time when the treaty of 1871 expired by our requirement in the middle of the fishing season, and another which was a supplement or appendix to the treaty now under consideration. The two arrangements that I have mentioned have been made to the satisfaction of the country, I think. I know that the arrangement now progressing, under the protocol to this treaty, is a very opportune one to keep down strife.

I have heard of no conflict, no trouble, since this treaty was sent in to the Senate of the United States, and I should like very much indeed to maintain the status quo upon that. If we could get along just as well in our fishing matters with the Canadians for the next fifty or a hundred years as we have been getting along since this treaty was negotiated we should have very little cause for disturbance. We have seen that whenever we have abandoned some agreement, some arrangement for the settlement of this very intricate and joint right, on every occasion difficulties have sprung up, and of such a serious character that on frequent occasions both sides have had to send their navies into those fishing grounds for the purpose of protecting their people. In other words, the arm of war has had to follow along this peaceful work for the purpose of keeping the peoples in the enjoyment of their right in common of fishing in those waters.

I desire very much indeed to do all that lies in my duty and in my power to prevent any occasion or necessity for embroilment between ourselves and Great Britain or any other country. I think that is the highest and first duty of a Senator. And I think, as we are engaged here in negotiating a treaty—for that is the function we are performing now—it is our duty to look over the entire field calmly, and not to rush to conclusions about it. It will not make very much in favor of the American people if the peace between Great Britain and the United States as to the enjoyment of these fishing rights is preserved for a month longer. I can see no reason for hurrying this treaty to an end, unless it may be some political reason. I do not know what we are going to gain by the destruction of this negotiation all of a sudden. I hear of no complaint against it anywhere in its actual operations. I do not know that we are suffering any detriment from it. I have heard no report of that kind; none comes up to the Senate, and none comes to the Department of State so far as I have heard. The urgency, it seems to me, for hurrying up the vote on this question must be of a partisan character. I have seen no reason of a public character suggested at all in regard to the operations of this treaty and its effect on the morale of the two countries that would indicate that there ought to be any haste in this discussion. Yet there seems to be great eagerness in it, great determination. Of course Senators must have their way. But I again announce that unless some reason is shown in public necessity for the destruction of this treaty right away, I, for one, shall insist on all my parliamentary rights as a Senator to prevent such an event.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. EVARTS. I then give notice that when the legislative matter before the Senate is disposed of, as moved on by my friend from Nevada, I shall move the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this fishery matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] as entitled to the floor when the consideration of the treaty is resumed.

The motion of Mr. STEWART was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in session for the consideration of legislative business.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2652) granting a pension to Gustave E. Peters;

An act (S. 896) granting a pension to Mrs. Louise Silvers;

An act (S. 692) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams;

An act (S. 3365) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill., to be used as an appraisers' warehouse and other public purposes.

The message also announced that the following bills, having been presented to the President on the 25th ultimo and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, have become laws without his signature:

A bill (S. 749) granting a pension to Louise Paul;

A bill (S. 842) granting a pension to Julia A. Rhoads; and

A bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser.

PUBLIC PARK AT TACOMA, WASH.—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1870, entitled "An act granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma, for the purpose of a public park."

It is proposed by this bill to permit the appropriation for a public park of a certain military reservation containing 635 acres, which was set apart for military and defensive purposes the 22d day of September, 1866.

The establishment of this reservation was strongly recommended by high military authority, and its preservation and maintenance have since that time been also urged by the same authority.

At this time, when the subject of national defense is much discussed, I can not account for the apparent willingness to grant, or permit to be used for other purposes, Government lands reserved for military uses.

I judge from an expression in the letter of the Chief of Engineers, made a part of the report of the committee of the House to which this bill was referred, that its original purpose was to absolutely transfer this reservation to the city of Tacoma. The Chief of Engineers suggested an amendment to the bill providing that the mere permission to use this land for a park should be granted, "and that this permission be given with the full understanding that the United States intends to occupy the lands or any part of them for military or other purposes whenever its proper officials see fit to order the same and without any claim for compensation or damage on the part of said city of Tacoma."

Instead of adopting the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, the provision of the bill limiting the extent of the use of this land declares "that the United States reserves to itself the fee and the right forever to resume possession and occupy any portion of said lands for naval or military purposes whenever in the judgment of the President the exigency arises that should require the use and appropriation of the same for the public defense or for such other disposition as Congress may determine without any claim for compensation to said city for improvements thereon or damages on account thereof."

The expediency of granting any right to the occupancy of this land is in my opinion very doubtful. If it is done, it should be in the form of a mere license, revocable at any time, for the purposes used by the officers to which its use and disposition are now subject.

It seems to me that if any use of this land is given to the city of Tacoma it should be with the proviso suggested by the Chief of Engineers, instead of the indefinite and restricted one incorporated in the bill.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 7, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. BERRY. I move that the message, with the bill, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. MAISH, and Mr. LAIRD managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5269) to relieve Jacob Y. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment; and

A bill (H. R. 10165) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas.

POSTAL CRIMES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 3d instant (the House of Representatives concurring) I return herewith the enrolled bill (S. 3303) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 7, 1888.

Mr. VEST. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the vote by which this bill was passed reconsidered?

Mr. VEST. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And also the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading?

Mr. VEST. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered if there be no objection, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Before that is formally done, however, as this is a bill returned by the President of the United States pursuant to a request of the two Houses, the Chair learns that the bill was introduced in the Senate and was passed by the House of Representatives after having been acted upon in this body. The Chair therefore is in doubt whether it is competent, before the House of Representatives has acted in the matter, to announce the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill passed the Senate. The Chair submits the matter for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair is right. I think there ought to be a resolution sent to the House of Representatives stating that the President has returned the bill in pursuance of the request of both Houses, and some proper assent should be obtained from the House of Representatives, that has agreed to the bill and has passed it, that its enrollment and the signature of its Speaker should be treated as canceled. The bill then would be up again for consideration in this body. I dare say that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] can prepare such a resolution before to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri, then, will indicate to the Chair when he is prepared to make the proper motion, the bill will be again laid before the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I may make this statement about it, not being an expert in parliamentary proceedings: A concurrent resolution was passed by the Senate and House of Representatives asking the President to return this bill, and, as matter of course, he returned it to the House in which it originated, which was the Senate in this instance. Now, it would seem to me, without further examination, that when the House of Representatives concurred in that resolution, knowing that the bill would come back, as matter of course, to the Senate, the bill should be here for our action. We certainly are not compelled now to ask the House of Representatives, "What will you do with this bill?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the bill which has been returned to this body has upon it the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the signature of the President of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I understand that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And therefore it would seem to be our duty to the House of Representatives, in preserving our concurrent jurisdiction, that we should not proceed to annul the signatures both of the Speaker of the House and of the President of the Senate, as we must do in effect without their understanding it and assenting to it. It is a matter of mere procedure before both Houses.

Mr VEST. Then I do not know what we can do about it but pass a resolution to be sent to the House before further action is had.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We should ask the House for its concurrence in the annulment of the signatures of the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. Then the bill will be open for the action of the two Houses.

Mr. RANSOM. If I may say one word, the bill is now in exactly the condition that it would be in if it had never gone to the President. It would be a Senate bill passed by the House, and having upon it the signature of the Speaker. It seems to me the proper way would be to send a message to the House of Representatives asking them to take the desired action on their part—to return that bill to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that the matter lie over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will lie over until to-morrow morning.

COMING OF CHINESE LABORERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 12.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. As there is not probably time to finish that bill this afternoon, and inasmuch as the bill to prohibit Chinese immigration, Order of Business 1801, has been partially considered, and I think can be concluded this afternoon if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is prepared to proceed with his remarks, I shall ask unanimous consent that the present Order of Business be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1801 on Chinese immigration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the present business of the Senate be laid aside in order that he may move the consideration of the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Mr. PLATT. May I have unanimous consent to say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada at this time, but simply to say that this bill for the admission into the Union of the State of Washington, which is now the unfinished business, as well as two bills which are in the special orders, have been standing before the Senate since the 24th of May—a long time. I am very desirous that there should be action upon those measures, and I simply say to the Senate that when the Chinese bill, which the Senator from Nevada desires to consider this afternoon, shall be out of the way I shall endeavor to press forward these bills for the admission of Territories as States into the Union at all times when I can.

Mr. STEWART. And I will co-operate with the Senator in that regard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside for the purpose of enabling the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1801, being the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill has been read at length in Committee of the Whole, and is open to amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill has been laid aside now for some days—some weeks I believe—and the subject may probably have faded from the minds of Senators to a considerable degree. I will therefore, for the purpose of presenting it, restate briefly the matter that I stated in my former remarks.

First, however, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a matter that I complained of before, which I think worthy of complaint, that the Senator from Oregon, the junior Senator now from that State [Mr. MITCHELL], introduced clippings from newspapers for the purpose of reflecting on this Administration in regard to a matter as to which this Administration has done and accomplished all that really has been accomplished in the exclusion of Chinese immigration from the United States. He read the following extract from the Daily Evening Bulletin, of San Francisco, published on Thursday, July 12, 1888, headed "Too good to be true:"

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE.

It is rumored that there is some doubt whether the Chinese Government will approve the new treaty because of the amendments introduced by the Senate. These amendments are the only valuable parts of the measure. But we are afraid that no such good luck is before us. The scarcely concealed bribe of $276,000 to the Chinese Government will secure the ratification. If the treaty were rejected the Administration would no longer have any excuse to oppose the only legislation that will reach the root of the Chinese evil. The treaty, even as amended, can lead to nothing but the gravest complications. The fisheries treaty, which has already been cut to pieces in the Senate, was wise diplomacy in comparison with the Chinese treaty. The latter is, in fact, the most outrageous sell-out of the present Administration.

It may be regarded as a treaty to facilitate Chinese immigration. Under it this country will be flooded with Chinese. Every cooly now ashore can be duplicated as often as he departs, while new hordes can be introduced by the transit privilege. Improvised traders, students, teachers, and travelers can be brought on the scene when everything else fails. There will be no check on the latter but the visé of our consuls, and what sort of a check that will be everybody knows. If this treaty had been considered in open Senate, like the fisheries treaty, it would have been defeated, provided our representatives exhibited as much industry and ability as the New England representatives of the fishing interests of the Northeast.—Daily Evening Bulletin, San Francisco, Thursday, July 12, 1888.

The Senator who introduced and read this remark from the San Francisco Bulletin accompanied it with the statement that he intended to vote for the bill now before the Senate, notwithstanding he believed it was a bill to carry out a treaty that was a sham and a fraud.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire what the Senator from Alabama was reading from?

Mr. MORGAN. I was reading an extract put into the speech of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] without any qualification, or without expressing any belief in the verity of the statement or suggestion made in it. I have read it as part of his statement and part of his argument.

I want to show the opinion that that Senator has, assisted by the editor, of the present Administration and of the treaty that has been amended here in the Senate and sent on for ratification now by the Chinese Government—the Senate having consented to put in some amendments to the text of the treaty as it was originally negotiated for the purpose of putting the matter as straight and square as words could make it, not merely that the coming of Chinese laborers to this country in the future ought to be prohibited, but also providing that those who have already gone out of the country upon our permits to return shall not be permitted to return. The Government of China coincides with us—that being an imperial government and having no respect, of course, for the rights of its own people—agrees with the Government of the United States that a privilege that has been granted to its subjects shall count for nothing, and that this present treaty shall make it useless.

I commented on that as pretty rough legislation. Nevertheless, it was such as carried out the purpose of the Chinese Government, which was announced to be, in a very distinct way, to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States. The Chinese Government, probably worried at the reversal of a governmental policy which shuts her people within her own gates, and also somewhat harassed at the treatment that some of them had received in some of our outlying Territories and remote places, has come to the conclusion that it is her duty to keep her citizens, her laboring population, from coming to the United States under any circumstances whatever. That treaty, as amended by the Senate, has been, as I am informed, sent on to China for ratification. How soon it will be back here we do not know; but this bill, which seems to be in the same language, introduced into both Houses, reported by the committees of both Houses, I understand, is to carry out that as yet unratified treaty. And while it appears to be quite an early movement and rather a novel movement also, I suppose it arises from the pressure of political necessity upon the gentlemen who are urging this measure now, and that they must prove by every means in their power that they are determined at this late day to exclude Chinese laborers from the United States absolutely.

Well, sir, it behooves the Republican party that they should prove that determination now, because, from the beginning, the other has been their policy. There is no party in the United States responsible for the introduction of Chinese into this country except the Republican party. There is no party that has worked so assiduously, unitedly, and powerfully for their exclusion from the United States as the Democratic party. There is no party that has at last succeeded in making a negotiation with China until this Administration came into power, and there is nobody that is sorry for that, as far as I know, except the Senator from Oregon, who quotes approvingly, and puts into his remarks, this article from the San Francisco Bulletin which says that it is too good to be true that the Senate has put some amendment into that treaty which will lead the Chinese to reject it.

Mr. President, this is a subject that has engaged the attention of the American people very seriously and for quite a long while, and it is as well that we should now come to an understanding as to the progress that has taken place in changing front on this matter since 1868, when Mr. William H. Seward and Mr. Anson Burlingame, with a couple of Chinese diplomatists, were engaged in making the treaty which presented the Chinaman to us and to the people of the world as a man who was entitled to all the privileges of expatriation and was entitled to an earnest, cordial, hospitable invitation to come to this country and occupy the land, and make himself generally useful to the people of the United States, and to himself, as well as to the cause of Christianity by giving up the worship of his joshes and the like, and accepting the Christian system as the one upon which he was hereafter to base his liberties and his conscientious conduct.

In Article IV we commence with the question of conscience in that treaty.

ARTICLE IV.

The twenty-ninth article of the treaty of the 18th of June, 1858, having stipulated for the exemption of Christian citizens of the United States and Chinese converts from persecutions in China on account of their faith, it is further agreed that citizens of the United States in China of every religious persuasion, and Chinese subjects in the United States, shall enjoy entire liberty of conscience, and shall be exempt from all disability or persecution on account of their religious faith or worship in either country. Cemeteries for sepulture of the dead, of whatever nativity or nationality, shall be held in respect and free from disturbance or profanation.

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

ARTICLE VI.

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

I do not suppose that the heart of man could open a wider gate for Chinese immigration than was opened in that Burlingame treaty, and the Chinese came in floods. They did not mince the work at all. Very soon they took possession of the Pacific country as laborers. They worked cheap; they were obedient. While not so skilled or so strong as the American laborer, you could hire two of them for the wages paid to one white man. They were submissive, docile, slavish in their characteristics. And men, it seems (it does not make any difference in what latitude they are born), when it comes to a question of personal service, like to have a little slavery about them. If they can not get negro slavery they will take Chinese. A little seasoning of slavery, it seems, they are obliged to have in order to promote their personal comfort. That was as attractive to the lords and nabobs of the Pacific coast as to many of our people who invited the Chinese in this broad and Christian way to occupy our country.

When we came to negotiate the next treaty—because it was not very long after that, in 1880, this question got to be a very serious one, indeed—they put into the second treaty all the provisions that were in the Burlingame treaty in regard to the right of protection, all the immunities that might be enjoyed by Chinese subjects in this country. We then commenced in that treaty to limit the influx of Chinese here by confining the right of all coming here to scholars, men of learning, merchants, travelers, and the like, but excluding to a certain degree the incoming of the laboring population.

It appears that the Chinese who came over here found their first competition among the white laborers of the United States—the Germans, the Irish, the Norwegians, and the Scandinavians, and whoever else were over there on the Pacific coast—white laboring people. These were the first competitors with the Chinese for the opportunity to work for fair wages. It was not long after this until these men discovered the condition of things, and until the politicians became aroused about it and the subject found its way into Congress. Acts of Congress were proposed here; some were passed, some were vetoed, and some were repassed for the purpose of giving force and effect to the few restrictions that were put in the treaty of 1880 limiting the right of Chinese laborers to come to this country. I will insert in my remarks at this point the treaty of 1880, about which I wish to make some comment:

TREATY—CHINA. NOVEMBER 17, 1880.

ARTICLE I.

Whenever in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to Chinese who may go to the United States as laborers, other classes not being included in the limitations. Legislation taken in regard to Chinese laborers will be of such a character only as is necessary to enforce the regulation, limitation, or suspension of immigration, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal maltreatment or abuse.

ARTICLE II.

Chinese subjects, whether proceeding to the United States as teachers, students, merchants or from curiosity, together with their body and household servants, and Chinese laborers who are now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord, and shall be accorded all the rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions which are accorded to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation.

ARTICLE III.

If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty.

ARTICLE IV.

The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China. If the measures as enacted are found to work hardship upon the subjects of China, the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Peking and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the foregoing at Peking, in English and Chinese, being three originals of each text of even tenor and date, the ratifications of which shall be exchanged at Peking within one year from date of its execution.

Done at Peking, this 17th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1880. Kuanghsü, sixth year, tenth moon, fifteenth day.

It appeared that the only effect of that treaty and the legislation that was had upon it was to bring into the courts of the United States a very large number of cases of habeas corpus and cases of like character, in which the individual right of Chinamen to come here was litigated. In the debates that occurred on the passage of these several acts, one of which was vetoed, and another of which became operative, statements were made of opinions of our leading statesmen, some of whom are still in this body and occupy very high positions, and some of whom are not here but still occupy high positions in the Government. Those gentlemen expressed their opinions, and I propose, for the purpose of showing how this matter progressed, to lay before the Senate some of those expressions. I am not aware that a single Democrat in the Senate from the time that the legislation first began up to this hour ever opposed the efforts for Chinese restriction. On the contrary, our most eminent men lent all the valuable assistance that they could to the progress of the measure and to restraining and retarding the incoming of Chinese, while on the other side of the Chamber there was a very formidable and a very able resistance.

I will now read from the debate which occurred on the 14th of February, 1879, when we were endeavoring to pass the first bill, I think it was, on this subject, which anticipated the treaty of 1880, and which was based on the idea of the reserved right of the people of the United States, irrespective of treaty obligations with other powers, to fix the character of the population that should come into the country. We denied that the Chinese Government had the right to throw upon us a class of very illiterate and very debased people, notwithstanding the broad invitation that had been given in the Burlingame treaty for Chinese of every class and character to come here. We said by opening the door of invitation to Chinese immigration that we did not mean to be understood as inviting all classes of people who might come, paupers, lepers, villains, and criminals of every description, or any other class of people who might become a very objectionable element in the party politics of this country. That was the way in which the question was first presented to the Senate. It was not upon the construction of the treaty power so much as it was upon the proposition whether or not the Burlingame treaty had interfered with our existing right as a sovereign power to regulate as to the classes and kinds and conditions of people who generally had a treaty right to come here, we having the right still of discrimination, there being nothing said about that in the Burlingame treaty. It was in arguing that phase of the case that Allen G. Thurman took the floor in the Senate, and after having discussed that bill considerably, said:

But my colleague proposes—

His colleague then was Hon. Stanley Matthews, now one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States—

But my colleague proposes that the President shall be set in motion to negotiate a new treaty. Why, I might ask, has he not had time enough to do this; did not his predecessor have time enough to negotiate a treaty, and his predecessor, too, and has not the attention of the Executive been called to this subject enough to induce us to say that if, after the lapse of ten, or twelve, or more years of discussion of this subject, sometimes warm and heated discussion, and certainly thorough and exhaustive discussion, if the executive department has not until this day moved in this matter, or has moved unsuccessfully, is it not time for Congress to take the business in hand? It does seem to me that it would be trifling with this subject to adopt the amendment suggested by my colleague, and which he has laid upon the table, to ask the President to go to work to negotiate with the Emperor of China for a modification of that treaty, and, if he can not get the modification by such a time, then to authorize the President to do what? To prohibit immigration? Not the least bit in the world; that is not the amendment; but to dec are that the treaty is at an end.

Well, suppose the treaty were at an end and there is no prohibitory legislation, John Chinaman could come here just as well as he did before the treaty was made. Putting an end to the treaty would not afford a remedy at all, but putting an end to the treaty would do a great deal of harm, perhaps, because we do not want to put an end to all of that treaty. The most of the treaty is good enough; we want the most of the treaty, and because the Emperor of China should not consent to abrogate those sections which provide for the immigration of Chinese here, are we to cut off our own noses by abrogating the whole treaty without China asking us to do so at all? No, Mr. President; that amendment will not do. That amendment would be of very great injury indeed, if it were adopted and were executed.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the true way is, there having been no modification of this treaty by the treaty-making power, and, so far as we know, no attempt having been made to modify it, there having been nothing of that kind done, many, many years having elapsed since the treaty was made, and the evil growing every year greater and greater, and the danger to which we are exposed by this migration becoming every year more and more imminent, it is now the duty of Congress without delay to take this matter in hand. Why, sir, we have taken it in hand to a certain extent; we did it long ago by the passage of the cooly bill, to which the Senator from Maine [Mr. Blaine] referred. By that bill we made it a penal offense for anybody to bring coolies here as servants or apprentices against their consent or for any stipulated time of service. We did that. That was not considered an unfriendly act by China; that was, in fact, rather in pursuance of the provisions of the treaty than otherwise, and it ought not to be considered by China an unfriendly act if we now put a stop to Chinese migration.

Sir, of all the countries on the face of this globe China is the last country to insist that her people shall migrate to other countries as a matter of right. Do we not know that for centuries upon centuries, more than ten centuries, China shut out the whole world from her borders, and although she now permits us to trade at a few ports, a very limited number, although she allows Americans to settle in some few of her ports, practically, we all know, that there is no such thing as American migration to China. The treaty is all one-sided in that respect. The Chinese are an emigrating nation, and whenever they have obtained a foothold they never have let go. Read the history of Cochin China, of Siam, of Anam; look at the condition of Borneo and Sumatra now; see the multitude of Chinese in Hindostan, and you will see that wherever that people have obtained a foothold they never recede; they increase and increase and increase; and so it will be here.

Now, Mr. President, it does not seem to me that they are a desirable population. I do not think that they can be molded with the rest of the people of this country into one homogeneous mass. We have already three races besides them on this continent, the white race, the black race, and the red man. That is enough. We want no more mixture of such races in this country; but we want time to amalgamate our white people who can amalgamate until they are a homogeneous people. We can go no further than that. I have, therefore, always been in favor of the immigration of white people to this country; I think that every one of them who comes to the country adds to the wealth and the strength of the country. I have had no fears from that migration here. I know that in the third or fourth generation their children's children will be amalgamated with the rest of the white population of the country, and we thus have a homogeneous country. But that can never take place between the whites and the Mongolians or other colored races. Their presence in our country, although it might be advantageous as furnishing a set of cheap and efficient laborers, carries with it such disadvantages that they more than countervail all the benefits we could derive from their presence.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that this bill, which it seems to me is pretty carefully drawn, which it seems to me is a moderate enough measure, will receive the approbation of the Senate and become a law.

Mr. COKE. Was that Judge Thurman?

Mr. MORGAN. That was Judge Thurman. He was the man that the Democratic party of this Senate always felt willing should lead, a man of wisdom, a man of high character, of great forecast. In those few observations he actually foretold and forecast the condition of things existing here to-day, when the Emperor of China becomes actively engaged in joint efforts with us to prevent the immigration of his own subjects to this country.

Judge Thurman had a great deal else to say about this matter, but that, I believe, comprises as nearly as I can find what you might term a syllabus of his opinions on this subject, and they are all on the right side, and he was one of the most powerful factors in the United States in the breaking down of that wild theory contained in the Burlingame-Seward treaty, which opened the floodgates of immigration to this land and has given us more trouble than we have had with any other race of people in the world.

Mr. BECK, another gentleman who was then prominent and is yet a powerful man in the Democratic ranks, gave his views on this subject, a brief part of which I will read:

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, when I sought the floor a few moments ago it was to urge the Senate to come to a vote. I expected to say a word or two, but the eloquent sermon preached by the Senator from Massachusetts has almost made it impossible for me to say anything. I agree with the Senator from California [Mr. Sargent]. The bill ought to pass. I believe that self-preservation is the first law of nature. If the President and his Cabinet are so diplomatic that after Congress refused to make Chinamen citizens and deprived them of the right that we give all people from elsewhere, Africans and everybody else, they did nothing, some steps ought to be taken by Congress whereby we may exercise the right to exclude them from our shores, if they can not stand upon an equality with the rest of us.

I believe that no greater evil can afflict a people than to have a set of peons, a degraded class, in our midst, who have not the rights of the humblest citizens. I do not believe that a set of men such as they have in California, who are living upon rice with perhaps a rat or two a week as a luxury, working for one-third what a civilized man can labor for, ought to be there in this age, struggling to keep down the rights of the white man. I believe that if the executive branch of the Government will not take hold of the matter, but refers it to the Congress of the United States, the Congress of the United States, after what has taken place, ought to step forward and defend the dignity of the white man and the right of the American laborer against these serfs (for that is what the Chinaman is) of the men of wealth who own the machinery and run the great corporations of that part of the country. It is not fair to the laboring class of our own people to allow that condition of things to exist any longer, and if the executive branch of the Government will not take hold of it, then it behooves us to do it.

Many of the lesser lights in the Democratic party at that time spoke upon the question freely and frequently, and always voted solidly for the passage of any bill that would have the effect to keep Chinese immigration out of this country.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did ever Judge Thurman while he was a Senator on this floor, did ever the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], since he has been a Senator on this floor, or did ever the Senator from Alabama now addressing the Senate, since he has been a Senator on this floor, or did any other Democratic Senator now a Senator on this floor, or who ever has been a Senator on this floor representing a State on this side of the Rocky Mountains, ever introduce any measure looking to the restriction of Chinese immigration? And is it not a fact that the very measures which were pending upon which those remarks were made to which the Senator has alluded were measures that were introduced by Republicans?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know that I can say who wrote the bills, but I think I shall look that up. I know that Senator Farley when he was here along with Senator Miller, was a very warm, firm, and arduous advocate of the bill on which he and Senator Miller united their forces.

Mr. MITCHELL. All Senators and members from the Pacific coast, Republicans and Democrats, without exception, I will say, have been earnestly in favor of the restriction of Chinese immigration.

Mr. MORGAN. And that Republican party, which you are now trying to laud to the extent of the very cruel statement taken from a California paper about the present Administration, standing against you, and you had to apply to the Democratic party for your help, and you could not have got your bills through without their assistance, because the Republicans on this side of the Rocky Mountains were against you, the great body of the Republican party was against these measures.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me again?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I undertake to assert without fear of successful contradiction that the best Chinese restriction bill that was ever reported from any committee or passed by either House of Congress was the bill that was reported from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of this body in 1886, and which bill was passed by the Senate and smothered and killed in the Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, in 1886 they got very sick of their arrangements; a good while had transpired since the Burlingame treaty; they had had the assistance of the Democratic party, I know, in this body at least, for no two men ever labored more assiduously than did Mr. Slater and Mr. Grover, of Oregon, for the purpose of passing these anti-Chinese bills. They spoke and worked in season and out of season; but in 1886 it was found necessary to reverse the wheel, to take a different course, and hence it was that these gentlemen finding out that the question had actually become one which was demanding a great deal of popular attention upon the Pacific coast, and being anxious in 1886 that they should be able to control the votes in that part of the world, they then went very industriously to work to recall what they had said and done before that time.

Now, sir, one of the most distinguished gentlemen in the Chicago convention that recently assembled—I believe he was on the committee that framed the platform of that party there—is a member of this body, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I desire, if I can find it, to lay before the Senate the language that was adopted in that convention in regard to Chinese immigration, and to make a little comparison of it with some other things that have been said and done.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Massachusetts was not upon the committee on resolutions.

Mr. MORGAN. He was not. He was at any rate a distinguished member of the convention. That gentleman led off on the Republican side of this question in the Senate. I will read presently from his remarks in the second debate that I trace to him——

Mr. GEORGE. When was that?

Mr. MORGAN. This was in 1882. I will commence with the Republican platform, which reads:

We declare our hostility to the introduction into this country of foreign contract labor and of Chinese labor alien to our civilization and our Constitution, and we demand the rigid enforcement of the existing laws against it, and favor such immediate legislation as will exclude such labor from our shores.

That must be admitted to be quite a strong departure from the Burlingame treaty, which was made by two of the most eminent Republicans in the United States, or that ever were in it, Mr. Seward and Mr. Burlingame. There is a broad gulf to be measured, and the steps by which that has been done were our work. It has not been done without labor and without resistance on the part of the Republican party.

Speaking in this body, on the 1st of March, 1882, Mr. HOAR said:

For myself and for the State of Massachusetts, so far as it is my privilege to represent her, I refuse consent to this legislation. I will not consent to a denial by the United States of the right of every man who desires to improve his condition by honest labor—his labor being no man's property but his own—to go anywhere on the face of the earth that he pleases.

I have said that this bill seems to me to violate the provisions of the treaty it professes to execute. It does more. It confers on every collector of customs the authority to seize and forcibly remove from the country, without trial or legal process, every person of Chinese race whom he shall determine to be in the United States in violation of its provisions. The alien laws of June 25 and July 7, 1798, passed when war was deemed imminent, at a time of great and dangerous excitement, conferred upon the President of the United States for a period limited to two years the power to order out of the country aliens whose presence he might judge dangerous to its peace, and gave him the further authority in case of actual war to cause the removal of resident aliens natives or citizens of the hostile nation.

These acts, passed against the protest of Hamilton, went far to cause the downfall of an administration. The alien law was overthrown because it intrusted the highest officer of the Government, the great constitutional lawyer and lover of liberty, John Adams, with the power for two years to order the removal of a single person whose presence for good cause he deemed dangerous to the public peace. But here a local officer of the smallest customs district may, yes, must, forcibly seize and expel, without trial or judicial hearing, the Chinese whom he finds within his precinct, however excellent his character, however advantageous his presence. We have experienced evils which required legislation to regulate immigration from other countries. But we have hitherto directed our remedy to the complaint.

There may be much that is wrong connected with the coming of these people from China, especially the importation of coolies. But let us in our statute use language which fitly describes the evil and would prevent, not language which strikes at the prerogative with which Government has no right to interfere. It it not importation, but immigration; it is not importation, but the free coming; it is not the slave, or the apprentice, or the prostitute, or the leper, or the thief, but the laborer at whom this legislation strikes its blow.

What has happened within thirteen years that the great Republic should strike its flag? What change has come over us that we should eat the bravest and truest words we ever spoke? From 1858 to 1880 there were added to the population of the country 42,000 Chinese.

Then on page 1520 of the same volume of the RECORD the same Senator said, after quoting some poetry, of which he is very fond indeed, and he always quotes it most admirably:

An argument is based on the character of the Chinese. You should take a race at its best, and not at its worst, in looking for its possibilities under the influence of freedom. The Chinese are in many particulars far superior to our own ancestors as they were when they first came forth into the light of history. Our British forefathers, at a time far within the historic period, remained in a degradation of superstition and a degradation of barbarism to which China never descended. Centuries after the Chinese philosopher had uttered the golden rule, and had said, "I like life and I like righteousness; if I can not keep the two together I will let life go; and choose righteousness," the Druids of Britain were offering human sacrifices to pagan deities. We must take a race at its best in determining its capacity for freedom. This race can furnish able merchants, skillful diplomatists, profound philosophers faithful servants, industrious and docile laborers. An eminent member of the other House told me that he had dealt with Chinese merchants to the amount of hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, and that they had never deceived him.

Joaquin Miller, the poet of the Pacific coast, writes a letter giving the result of his observation as a magistrate for four years, every word of which is worth reading:

"To the Editor of the Tribune:

"SIR: Fearful that the President of the United States may be induced to sign the Chinese anti-emigration bill, I beg to submit to his consideration the following brief statements: In the first place it is claimed that this is a bill which the Pacific people have deeply at heart. I venture to assert that not half of the solid wealth and worth of the far West, outside of the politicians, favor this bill. I have many letters protesting against it as a coarse and cruel measure. My parents, all my people, my heart and my home are there. I know the hardy, honest-hearted settlers there, and I know that they protest against this measure which politicians are trying to compel through Congress in their name. And why is this being done? As early as 1854 this cry against the Chinese began to be heard along the wharves and about the hotels of San Francisco. It came from Irish laborers and porters, but the cry was equally loud against the negro and the Mexican. In a few years it became more loud, and centered on the Chinaman, for the Mexican had melted away before us and the negro had gravitated back home. But the cry now came also from the Irish "help," who, by extortionate wages had brought the Chinamen in competition. These chambermaids, etc., had brothers, lovers. These brothers and lovers were voters—makers of Congressmen. The Chinamen did not vote, and so had no champion. This is the key to the whole question. This outcry against the Chinamen has from that day been a political shibboleth. No man yet, so far as I have known, has gone to Congress and had the manhood to rise in his place and bravely tell the truth and speak a fearless word for this silent and friendless stranger.

"About 1856 the Chinaman began to take hold of the placer mines alongside of the miners of the Sierras. Up to that time he had confined himself, as a rule, to the pan and rocker and kept in the wake of the white miner; but now he took to the long tom, sluice, and flume, and bought and worked mines on a large scale. He never ventured to 'take up' a claim, but timidly held his ground by bill of sale from some speculator, who had sold it to him at a fabulous price. The honest men of the Sierras welcomed them, and side by side they worked together for many years; and I am certain that every miner of those days who has no selfish ends to serve will gladly testify to the honesty, industry, and neighborly good nature of these silent little brown men. These people, at the same time, were terribly taxed by the county authorities; but they always came up promptly, and without a word of complaint paid what was demanded of them. At Canyon City, Grant County, Oregon, this monthly tax was $5 a head for every Chinaman. They had to constantly endure wrongs from every drunken ruffian or reckless "hoodlum" who saw fit to impose upon them; yet they were the most peaceful people we had among us. I sat on the bench as judge of this county for four years, and I will state on the honor of a magistrate that the calendar, both criminal and civil, showed the names of at least ten white men to one Chinaman, although the Chinese population, during the most of this time, outnumbered the whites. Let me here say that I never, during all my years of intercourse with this people as miner or magistrate, saw a single drunken Chinaman. I never saw a Chinese beggar; I never saw a lazy Chinaman. They are perhaps the most industrious people in the world. It is a part of the Chinaman's religion that in the sweat of his face he shall eat his bread.

"Can the United States afford to fear these patient and simple people? They will not harm us. They are not strikers, rioters, and burners of cities. But there is something more in this than the selfish question of our own security. The Chinaman who returns home carries something more than our gold to his land; he takes with him and disseminates there all the art, civilization, freedom, or truth which he found here. These are the real missionaries to China. This bill must not become a law. This bold attempt to make it so ought to condemn to everlasting infamy every one of the great names that advocated it. The little men who stand as ciphers to dignify and add to these great figures in Congress are not, perhaps, so much to blame. But it is pitiful to see these great minds prostituted to such selfish aims. They pay a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people of the Pacific coast if they think they are not perfectly understood. No; the Creator of us [all opened the Golden Gate to the whole wide world. Let no man attempt to shut it in the face of his fellow-man.

"JOAQUIN MILLER.

"NEW YORK, February 23, 1879."

Further on, on page 1522 of the same volume, speaking of the report made by Mr. Morton, then a Senator from Indiana, which has been somewhat disputed and debated about, as to whether Mr. Morton actually intended to sign that report or not, after he had visited the Pacific coast at the head of a committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

I wish also to read in this connection what Mr. Morton says as his conclusion—

I suppose Mr. Morton will be taken as pretty high authority in any Republican Senate—

"That they have injuriously interfered with the white people of California, or have done them a serious injury, may well be doubted. The great fact is that there is to-day and always has been a scarcity of labor on the Pacific coast. There is work for all who are there, both white and Mongolian, and the State would undoubtedly develop much more rapidly were there more and cheaper labor. There was much intelligent testimony to the fact that the Chinese by their labor opened up large avenues and demand for white labor. The Chinese performed the lowest kind, while the whites monopolized that of a superior character. This was well stated by Mr. Crocker, a very intelligent witness, largely interested in the Central Pacific and Southern California Railroads. In answer to a question as to what was the effect of Chinese upon white labor, and whether it was to deprive white men of employment, or had that effect at any time, he said: 'I think that they afford white men labor. I think that their presence here affords to white men a more elevated class of labor. As I said before, if you should drive these seventy-five thousand Chinamen off you would take seventy-five thousand white men from an elevated class of work and put them down to doing this low class of labor that the Chinamen are now doing, and instead of elevating you would degrade the white labor to that extent.'"

Then again from the same report:

"For any man to ride through California, from one end of the State to the other, and see the miles upon miles of uncultivated land, and in the mountains millions of acres of timber, and the foothills waiting for some one to go and cultivate them, and then talk about there being too much labor here in the country, is simply nonsense, in my estimation. There is labor for all, and the fact that the Chinamen are here gives an opportunity to white men to go in and cultivate this land where they could not cultivate it otherwise. Other evidence showed that by Chinese labor over 1,000,000 acres of tule lands have been reclaimed. This was work of the hardest and most unhealthy character, requiring them to work for a large part of the time in mud and water; but the lands, when reclaimed, were occupied and cultivated by white men, furnishing a great many homes, and were in fact the richest and most productive in California. They also chiefly performed the work in constructing irrigating canals for farming purposes, and dams and canals for supplying the mines with water, by which a very large extent of country was made exceedingly productive, furnishing homes and employment for thousands of white men, and by which, also, the mines were made profitable, and created a large demand for white labor. The evidence further showed that the railroads, chiefly constructed by these people, were the pioneers in settlement and agriculture; that the settlements followed the railroads; that wherever a railroad was constructed the lands were taken up and converted into farms and homesteads. While there was complaint that the Chinese, by their cheap labor, took it from white people, inquiry failed to show that there was any considerable number of white people in California out of employment, except those who were willfully idle; that there was work, and remunerative work, for all who chose to perform it."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] proceeded:

California has a population of 700,000. She can support 17,000,000. Will it be claimed that these 17,000,000 will not be better off by finding there the wealth and the improvements which Chinese labor will prepare for their possession; by finding the railroad built, the swamp drained, the highway smoothed, the harbor dredged?

Will it be maintained that if California could have for nothing what she gets cheaply from Chinese labor, she would not be better off? If the swamp lands had been made prairie lands by nature; if the ravines had been filled and mountains tunnelled by nature, so that the road-bed was ready for the rail; if every man, instead of buying shoes from Massachusetts, had a pair left gratis at his door, that the State would not be better off? Is barren land or productive land best for a State? Then surely the laborer who does these things at least cost does most for the community, and gives the people who occupy the State opportunity for better profit in other fields of industry.

That is good Republican philosophy, but it does not accord with the genius of the present hour—I mean the protection theory—

Then surely the laborer who does these things at least cost does most for the community and gives the people who occupy the State opportunity for better profit in other fields of industry.

That was March 13, 1882.

Mr. STEWART. Whose report was that?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. HOAR'S speech in which he introduced a report of Mr. Morton. I am only going over the headlight, looking out for those gentlemen who now throw great light upon the Republican situation in the United States and undertake to throw very deep shadows on the Democratic party; but I am determined that the truth shall be told about this Chinese question, and it shall be understood by all men in the world, if proof amounts to anything, that the Republican party, through its eminent leaders, were the men who opened the gates to Chinese immigration and introduced it here, and that those who are now the great leaders of its party, visiting its national convention, and leaving the Senate for that purpose, shaping its nominations, its platforms, and all that, are gentlemen who insisted, against our efforts to pass Chinese restriction bills, that no such law as that should pass, the reason being that the Chinese after all in their origin were better than our ancestors, much more enlightened men, much more civilized men than our ancestors, and that in their progress they had become very numerous, very strong, and very convenient for building railroads, orchards, vineyards, digging ditches, and the like of that.

Mr. GORMAN. I would like to ask a question of the Senator from Alabama, who seems to have given this subject great attention. I have seen it stated in the public prints, and would like to know whether it is true or not, that at the time when this immigration came in so rapidly, it was under a contract made by the celebrated syndicate of which Mr. Ames, of Boston, was at the head and those controlling the Central Pacific Railroad, that the Chinamen were brought in under contract, and the famous Six Companies were formed under an arrangement between certain Chinese and these two railroad companies?

Mr. MORGAN. I can only say to the Senator that that has been the common information and common belief of the people of the United States, though matters that are not known, I suppose, very distinctly. It would be very difficult to find the record that would prove it. At the same time, I think it has been stated that the Six Companies that originated the combination were under and all their influence was gained through the assistance given them by the railroad being built into California, the Central Pacific and afterwards the Southern Pacific and their branch lines that are now in the control of some Senators in this body and others who are very strict anti-Chinesemen.

Mr. STEWART. That is a mistake. The companies originated in 1850.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator seems to know what the fact is; suppose he inform us.

Mr. STEWART. I will tell you all about it after a while.

Mr. MORGAN. What I know about it is this: When I was in California on two occasions, looking into the subject, I was informed that every Chinaman who came to the United States, or that part of the United States, at least, became a servant, I will call it—became subject to the power of these Six Companies.

Mr. STEWART. From the beginning.

Mr. MORGAN. From the beginning. Every Chinaman who comes here is the servant of the Six Companies. It makes no difference where he works, he has to go there to make his accounts. If you wish to obtain a body of Chinamen to work on a railroad, or to cultivate your vineyard, or plow your land, or whatever it may be, you never think of going to the individual men who are to do the work and make contracts with them, but you go to the authorized agent of the Six Companies, and he selects the men and sends them to you, and he sends along an overseer or manager, a sort of curator, who takes charge of everything about them, sees that they are fed and clothed, and all that, and then when their wages are paid, they are placed in the hands of this overseer. He goes to the Six Companies and makes the return, and these men have placed to their credit on the books of the Six Companies the amount of money they are entitled to, the deduction for clothing, provisions, etc., received, and if they are dead they are sent back home out of the money remaining in the hands of the Six Companies. So it is quite an easy thing for a great railroad or any other great corporation or for a powerful man to obtain the influence of the Six Companies in procuring just as much Chinese labor as he wants.

As a matter of course an individual laborer—an Irishman, a German, or whatever he may be, it makes no difference how industrious or skillful—has no chance against a gang of that kind—none whatever. He is but one man and they are multitudinous. They comprise the whole body of the Chinese in the country, without a single exception. They are all of them under the domination of the Six Companies. What chance has an ordinary white laborer to obtain employment and maintain his family in the presence of a combination of that kind?

There is no race of people on this earth who have such slavish instincts in respect of their personal liberty as the Chinese. The negro is a much more independent man than the Chinaman. I do not think it would be possible to organize in the Southern States, with all the superstition and peculiarities that the negro population have, and all their clannish disposition, any such organization as this. You could not organize six companies if they had $5,000,000 of capital each to work upon. You could not get such control of the negro population as these Six Companies have of the Chinese population in California and Oregon.

Hence it is that whenever an individual laborer is seeking employment he is met by an avalanche of competition. He can not possibly stand it. There is no chance for the man, and while we declaim against these men for being lawless and for holding their meetings and building up their political party to such an extent as that they got hold of the constitutional convention of the State of California and put just such provisions in the constitution of that State as they chose, some of which were very absurd and very injurious—while we complain of this and the rest of the States complain of it, and rightfully, nevertheless these men were resisting as best they knew how this powerful monopoly of labor in the hands of the Six Chinese Companies on the Pacific coast, and the men who have been fighting for them on this side of the Rocky Mountains have been, through thick and thin time and time again, the Democratic party, and the men they have had to resist have been the Republican party, with a few exceptions of the gentlemen from the Pacific coast who come here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator then answer me one question? If that is so, why is it that the records of Congress show that since 1882 the Democratic House of Representatives has not passed a single bill upon the subject, while the Republican Senate has reported and passed a very fine bill towards restricting Chinese immigration? Why is that so, if the Democratic party is doing all this business?

Mr. MORGAN. Since when?

Mr. MITCHELL. Since 1882.

Mr. MORGAN. Some laws have been passed here that have been vetoed by Presidents because they were supposed to be contrary to the spirit of our treaties, and it is very possible that some Democrats may have concluded that an effort in that direction would be unavailing until we could get a Democratic administration to have this thing put upon a proper foundation.

I think it is very likely they have done so. But just as soon as Mr. Cleveland came in he commenced negotiations on this subject with the Chinese Government, and they resulted in a treaty of absolute exclusion. There is no human being who can show a more total and complete reversal of a public policy than is shown by the treaty which was negotiated by the present Administration as compared with the Burlingame treaty and with the successive treaties that were negotiated by Mr. Frelinghuysen. This Democratic Administration has accomplished the first step in that direction, and the last step, by putting into the body of the treaty negotiated with China the absolute and peremptory exclusion of these laborers, and yet the Senator from Oregon is not satisfied. I do not think the Senator and his party ever can be satisfied.

The newspaper that he quotes from so liberally rejoiced, saying that it is afraid there is not going to be any such good luck as to have this last treaty, that it will not eventuate so as to keep anybody out. If it will not you can not frame an agreement between governments that will. We have reached to the bottom of the subject; we have reversed the whole of the Burlingame and Seward treaty, and here we stand with this treaty now, and we are prepared to go right along and pass this bill even before its ratification; and the Senator knows very well that the present Democratic House of Representatives have reported a bill precisely like the one we have got here, and he knows also, I suppose, that this subject has been brought to the attention of the Department of State—this very bill—and its opinion has been asked upon this bill, and I hold the letter before me which I will put in the RECORD to show that the Department of State recommend the passage of the bill. The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 6, 1888

MY DEAR SIR: I received this morning your letter of the 3d instant in regard to the Chinese restriction bill, with which you send a copy of the bill, as you intend to report it to the Committee on Foreign Relations for their consideration.

I have had the bill carefully compared with the bill as agreed on by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, and with some slight changes the two bills seem to be the same. The differences between the two bills are as follows:

1. In section 1 the House bill (H. R. 10605) provides "that from and after the date of the exchange of ratifications," etc. The bill as prepared by you provides "that beginning with the date of the exchange of ratifications," etc. The difference is purely verbal, as you will see, but I think the formula of the House bill preferable.

2. In section 2 you leave out lines 28 to 32 of the House bill, as follows: "No collector of customs shall receive from the captain of any vessel any sealed certificate as aforesaid, or permit the landing of any person on the strength of such certificate without the accompanying letter above described." This is a question of restriction, as to which the Department entertains no definite opinion. It is a question for the consideration of your committee whether or not it is wise to have such a clause inserted. This clause was in the original draught of the bill introduced by Mr. BELMONT in the House.

3. In section 3, line 2, you have the word "subjects" after the word "Chinese." The word "subjects" is omitted from the House bill; so that the clause reads: "That the provisions of this act shall apply to all Chinese, and persons of Chinese descent, whether subjects of China or other foreign power." But the clause as you have it appears to be a little misleading, and it might be interpreted to mean that the exclusion is limited to subjects of China, and not to other Chinese subjects of other countries unless they are "persons of Chinese descent."

4. In section 7 you have an amendment in line 35, in which the word "entry" is used. Ought not this be "re-entry?" The whole section relates to the re-entry of the Chinese laborers into the United States. It is "re-entry" in the House bill.

I inclose herewith a copy of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs [H. R. 10605], which, as you will observe, is precisely like the bill of which you were good enough to send me a copy, except the four points to which I have called your attention.

Very truly, yours,

G. L. RIVES.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH, etc.

It looks to me if there was any chance in the world for the Democracy of this country to make a record that is respectable, that we have rather got a good one in all this.

On March 2, 1882, Mr. Farley, of California, a Democratic Senator, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] were in controversy in a general running debate over the bill that was then pending. Mr. Farley said in the conclusion of one of his points:

Now I ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts—I put the question broadly and squarely to him—if he would be in favor to-day of permitting the Chinese to exercise the elective franchise in this country?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from California will pardon me. I was engaged accidentally in conversation.

Mr. FARLEY. Did the Senator hear my question?

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the question.

Mr. FARLEY. I read from the report of Senator Morton. I am sorry the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was engaged, because I wanted an answer to my question. Governor Morton, in his report as chairman of the committee appointed to investigate the question, made use of this remark—for the benefit of the Senator I will read it again, as it is short:

"But before entering upon the discussion of any other principles, I may be permitted to observe that, in my judgment, the Chinese can not be protected in the Pacific States while remaining in their alien condition. Without representation in the Legislature or Congress, without a voice in the selection of officers, and surrounded by fierce and, in many respects, unscrupulous enemies, the law will be found insufficient to screen them from persecution. Complete protection can be given them only by allowing them to become citizens and acquire the right of suffrage, when their votes would become important in elections, and their persecutions, in great part, converted into kindly solicitation."

Such was the language of Senator Morton in that celebrated report from which the Senator yesterday quoted. I now put the question to the honorable Senator: Does he indorse that sentiment expressed by Senator Morton?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it strikes me that is rather an unusual method of conducting debate in this body.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator need not answer the question unless he desires to do so.

Mr. HOAR. I was perfectly aware of that when I rose. It strikes me that it is rather an unusual method of conducting debate in this body. I made certain points in regard to this question yesterday, as well as I could, and for the Senator who replies to me to undertake to call me to stand before the Senate to answer his catechism, to state on certain other questions, on which I did not touch, what my opinions are, is rather unusual; but I will answer the Senator's question if he will first answer mine. Who are the fierce and unscrupulous enemies against whom it has been impossible to protect this race to whom Senator Morton referred?

Mr. FARLEY. A very large portion of the class to whom, I suppose, Senator Morton referred were persons who had been driven from employment by the influx of this population; persons who were unable to earn a livelihood for themselves and their families; persons who had become exasperated over what they believed to be a trampling upon their rights as common laborers. I suppose Senator Morton referred to that class.

Mr. HOAR. Does not Senator Morton distinctly affirm in his report, is it not shown by the tables, that the wages of white laborers had risen, and does he not say that the influx of these people into this country was a benefit to the white laborer of California and an increase of her wealth?

Mr. FARLEY. Who said so?

Mr. HOAR. Did not Senator Morton say so in his report?

Mr. FARLEY. I do not know whether he said so or not.

Mr. HOAR. I believe the Senator will find that he said so there. Now I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. FARLEY. I will try to answer yours, also.

Mr. HOAR. I do indorse that sentiment.

Mr. FARLEY. Then I understand the Senator from Massachusetts takes the ground (and that is one of the reasons I suppose why he opposes this bill) that he is in favor of the naturalization of Chinese; that he is in favor of giving to them the right of suffrage, permitting them to vote at the polls and to be as other persons who are citizens of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me for interrupting him?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I am in favor of admitting to the privileges of American citizenship, under proper limitations in case of foreigners who have been educated in attachment to other governments, every human being—white, black, red, yellow, copper-colored, or whatever color nature may have seen fit to use in painting men's skins—having first ascertained that they have abandoned all allegiance to other governments; that they are fit in character, in intelligence, in qualities that make good citizens, and are attached to our Government. I would have that ascertained by an inquiry into the character of the individual applicant, and not by looking at the color of his skin. I should be quite as ready to admit to American citizenship Yung-Wing, to whom they gave the degree of Doctor of Laws at Yale College last year, or the learned and admirable gentleman who died at Cambridge last week, to the sorrow of that community, as I should the persons whom Senator Morton described as fierce and unscrupulous ruffians.

Mr. FARLEY. He did not use the word "ruffian."

Mr. HOAR. I believe he did not. I will add that word.

Mr. FARLEY. You can add it. I have no doubt the people of California, certainly those who are opposed to Chinese, will be very thankful indeed to the Senator from Massachusetts for adding that addendum to Mr. Morton's report.

Mr. HOAR. I only applied that term to the men who with crime and cruelty treat in a ruffianly way unoffending human beings without provocation. If there are any such, wherever they live, I think the term I used would put into language their description. I do not apply it to the people of California.

Then Mr. Farley continued the debate upon another branch of the subject.

Now I will read from Mr. Bayard. On the 3d of March, 1882, in the same general debate in the Senate, he said:

Mr. President, I willingly recognize the brotherhood of man, and respond to humanity wherever its voice may be heard; but there is an instinct of self-preservation in nations as well as in individuals. There is an instinct and a duty of justice. A man must be true to himself before he can be true to others; and a nation must be true to its own people before it undertakes to expand its energies in favor of strangers and aliens. There is no inhumanity, there is no injustice in saying that our duty to republican institutions compels us to consider the character of the population under which such institutions may hopefully be conducted. We consider it in our treaties, we consider it in our laws, we consider the tendencies of treaties and the tendencies of laws; and in the present case, acting under an explicit treaty stipulation, under a statute proposing a remedy confessedly less extreme than the treaty itself obviously would permit, the opportunity, and it seems to me, the duty for us has arisen to act.

I do not state this case too strongly. I find in a newspaper from California, dated the 24th of February, not a week old, the Call, published in San Francisco, a report of the trades' assembly of the Chinese committee, and an appeal made "To the working men and women of the United States," which I have read, and by which I have been much impressed. Senator Morton, our late associate, has been cited as in some way giving indirect approval to the continued and uninterrupted immigration of Chinese laborers into this country, and yet I find by this paper that when he had in 1877 conducted an investigation into this very question, in the very communities most affected by it, and where the cry of distress was loudest, he concluded that it had "become painfully evident that the Pacific coast must in time either become American or Mongolian." That was his judgment in 1877. Years have rapidly and constantly reaffirmed its justice; and when it comes to that—and that is the issue presented to the American people or presented to the American Senate—I ask how can there be other or ought there to be other than one reply?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I, without troubling the honorable Senator from Delaware, ask him for the authority on which he ascribes to Mr. Morton that sentiment?

Mr. BAYARD. I find the extract from Senator Morton's opinion published on the 24th of February in the report of the Trades Assembly of the Chinese Committee, ending with an appeal to the American people and stating themselves to be—

"The representative assembly of trades and labor unions of the Pacific coast, having appointed a committee some three months ago to collect statistics on the Chinese cooly-labor question, now present the result of its investigations as contained herein."

And in the course of that appeal—and I shall have it read presently—occurs the language which I have just read and which is ascribed to the late Senator Morton who, it is said:

"Joined with the other members of the committee in declaring that it has become painfully evident that the Pacific coast must in time either become American or Mongolian.

"Also, that the Chinese have advantages which will put them far in advance in this race for possession. They can subsist where the American would starve. They can work for wages which will not furnish the barest necessities of life to an American."

Mr. HOAR. Will the honorable Senator permit me to say that Senator Morton left unfinished at his death a document which stated his conclusions upon the evidence taken by the Congressional committee of which he was a member, in large part, and conclusions diametrically opposite to, impossible to be reconciled with, the existence of such an opinion as has been ascribed to him, if I correctly understand what the Senator now says. I will say further that the gentleman to whom Senator Morton, his strength being somewhat impaired, dictated that report I saw yesterday. I read to the Senate some portions of it. Some sentences will be found in the remarks which I had the honor to submit. I should trespass on the courtesy of the honorable Senator if I were to undertake to read them through. I was inclined to do so when I rose; but I will not ask the Senator to yield for that purpose.

Then Mr. Bayard, after some discursive talk between Mr. Miller, Mr. McMillan, and others, continued:

Now, Mr. President, it is no impeachment of the character of Chinese civilization, it is no denunciation of them either as a people or as individuals, to say that they are unlike ourselves, to say that their civilization has proceeded and to-day is based upon a principle profoundly different from our own. So far as I can learn, the great governing principle of the Chinese Empire over its people is the sense of a dominating and coercive exterior force. So far as I comprehend the true strength of American civilization, it is from the interior; it is from the self-expression; it is that which lies within his breast that governs the citizen, and not his fear of and compulsion of that which lies without. Taking that great and as I consider profound distinction between the main-springs of power of the two governments, to what results are you led?

That you are to rely upon the voluntary principle of self-government to control a people and a race which have never known any but the involuntary principle of coercive government! These habits of thought and rule are ingrained. We are all children of the same Great Father, but by centuries of habit marked and essential characteristics are formed, and the characteristics of nations are so widely different that he who fails to recognize them must be blind indeed or utterly regardless of those great facts which are not improperly styled "God's arguments."

Now, sir, without, as I say, impeaching the variant civilizations or speaking unkindly or with any absence of proper humanity and sense of human brotherhood toward these different nations of the earth, the question is for us to determine how far they can and do adjust themselves to those things near and dear to us, and which we believe to be the very foundation-stones of our social and political existence. That is the question.

Again Mr. Bayard said:

Mr. President, I have said as much as, perhaps more than, I intended when I rose. There are many other features of this law, there are many other results of this law, of deep and great interest, but I have said enough to satisfy me that I should be wrong, in the face of the facts proven to exist, and in full hearing of that cry of distress from that section of the country, if I did not feel authorized by the very spirit of comity and by this treaty, deliberately and voluntarily made and solemnized between these two nations, to apply a remedy and apply it at once and for a practical period, not ten years short and unstable.

Here perhaps I may as well present for insertion in the RECORD the "appeal" to which I have alluded.

"An appeal to the working men and women of the United States.

"The representative assembly of trades and labor unions of the Pacific coast, having appointed a committee some three months ago to collect statistics on the Chinese cooly-labor question, now present the result of its investigations as contained therein.

"The time has come when decisive action must be taken to stop Chinese immigration. A bill will be introduced in the United States Senate in December by Senator Miller, of California, totally prohibiting Chinese immigration into the United States, and the other California Representatives have promised to support the bill for this purpose. The people of California desire the hearty co-operation of all interested in the freedom and elevation of labor throughout the United States to agitate this question by public demonstration at the time the bill is introduced in the Senate, and thus bring the pressure of public opinion to bear upon Congress, in order to show that the people are alive to the importance and gravity of the situation.

"The experience of thirty years of Chinese cooly competition with free white labor on the Pacific coast entitles us to speak with every degree of authority as to its pernicious and degrading effects. This competition is inevitably destructive, and will be certain to force the laboring American down in habits and expenses of life to the level of the half-barbarian. Labor should be honorable and honored, and not degraded by being compelled to compete with a debased and servile race. In the struggle between cooly and free white labor the latter is heavily handicapped. The cooly brings neither wife nor family with him; consequently he finds no difficulty in underbidding the Caucasian worker, who maintains his family in a decent, civilized manner, and has been taught to believe that honorable toil is worthy of more than a bare subsistence. The cooly comes here with the sole purpose of accumulating all the money he can. To do so he lives poorly, crowded together as close as possible without regard to sanitary requirements—a hundred of them being contented in a house not large enough for ten of our own race—and, as a consequence, they have developed all the evils engendered by such overcrowding and close personal contact. His five thousand years' training to wretched frugality in competition with his five hundred million of fellow-Mongolians has taught him how to live upon the least possible amount of air and food. The conflict of the two races in California has so far only been a question of the 'survival of the CHEAPEST,' and not a 'survival of the fittest.' Cheap labor, as such, is a curse to any country—even from a dollar-and-cent standpoint. The policy of cheap labor is a policy tending to the degradation and decivilization of the many by the enrichment and advancement of the few, and as such we must oppose it. The permanent prosperity of a country depends upon the just distribution of the wealth of labor among the producers of it.

"In 1877 a Congressional committee was appointed to take evidence in California from all classes of the community in order to arrive at an intelligent estimate of the influence and probable results of unrestricted Chinese immigration. After impartially investigating the question, in their report they spoke of the Chinese as 'making their way by revolting characteristics and by dispensing with what would be mere necessaries in modern civilization.' The late Senator Morton joined with the other members of the committee in declaring than 'it has become painfully evident that the Pacific coast must in time either become American or Mongolian;' also, that 'the Chinese have advantages which will put them far in advance in the race for possession; they can subsist where the American would starve; they can work for wages which will not furnish the barest necessaries of life to an American.'

"The evidence taken before the California State senate committee on Chinese immigration, at Sacramento, in 1878, when testimony was taken from witnesses of all classes—clergymen, judges, lawyers, ship captains, State and city officials, etc.—fully sustained the general belief of the people of California as to the disastrous consequences of Chinese presence in this country.

"THE GREAT NUMBER.

"It has been calculated that the number of Chinese in California is about one hundred and fifty thousand, or nearly 20 per cent. greater than the number of male whites capable of bearing arms. Although forming one-sixth of the total population of California, they pay less than one four-hundredth part of the revenue required for the State government. In the city of San Francisco they number from thirty-five thousand in summer to forty and fifty thousand in winter, when many come in from the country. In his testimony before the senate committee, Alexander Badlam, assessor of San Francisco, said the Chinese in the city have personal property to the amount of $500,000, and real estate to the amount of $200,000 assessed to them, thereby only paying one three-thousandth part of the taxes, although forming nearly one-sixth of the population.

"Nearly $8,000,000 are sent home to China annually on the Pacific coast.

"The Chinese women are imported almost wholly for the purpose of prostitution, San Francisco being cursed with about four thousand of these human chattels, and whose contamination and pollution are destroying our youths.

"Our objections to the Chinese may be summed up as follows: They underbid white men in the labor market; purchase little or no American products and manufactures; live squalidly crowded together, constantly engendering disease unlike white immigrants, they do not come to make homes with us and help; build up the country, but come without wives or children; they do not and can not assimilate with the Caucasian race; they continue their heathenish religion and customs; evade our laws, especially internal revenue, whenever possible; use the State and Federal laws frequently to carry out sentences which have been awarded by their own secret tribunals, and also to keep Chinese women in a state of bondage and prostitution, these poor creatures being openly bought and sold among them; have secret tribunals of their own for trying and punishing those who dare to rebel against the arbitrary authority of the Chinese companies, which, under the name of benevolent associations, virtually control nearly all the Chinese in the State, these companies, through their agents, making contracts to supply workmen, receiving the wages from the white contractor and settling with the Chinese cooly after their own fashion. Recent developments show that the Six Companies have been increased to nine in number. The dangerous criminal element among the Chinese, known as "Highbinders"—men ready for any deed of violence for a money consideration—leagued with the gamblers and others, have lately succeeded in gaining control of the Chinese companies, who levy blackmail and collect head-tax. One company alone collected $4,000 head-tax on the departure of the China steamer this month—November. This latter practice is carried on in defiance of a State law passed by the last Legislature to prevent such infamous extortions.

"The results in all occupations where the Chinese compete with white labor are most disastrous to the latter. In cigar-making they have nearly driven out the whites. In 1878 there were about five hundred white cigar-makers in San Francisco. At present they number only one hundred and seventy-nine. The Chinese cigar-makers number eight thousand five hundred. A large quantity of tobacco is brought to California from the East, manufactured into cigars by Chinamen in San Francisco, and reshipped east, to the amount of sixteen to eighteen million cigars a month, thus directly competing with eastern white labor. The white cigar-makers of California have suffered more from the curse of Chinese labor than any other trade, most of whom, despairing of any improvement in the future, have left the State or engaged in other employments.

"In view of the foregoing facts, we repeat our appeal to the producers of the United States to agitate this question when the bill is introduced in the Senate, and thus arouse the public to the danger that is threatening white labor throughout the Union. Unless stringent measures are adopted to entirely prohibit emigration we are lost, for the evil, although greatest on the Pacific coast, is working its way eastward, and all large cities now have their Chinese colony. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. The experience of the Pacific coast must be heeded as a warning to the eastern people to crush the evil before it is too late. By united effort success is assured. Our cause is just, and should prevail."

We have very distinguished gentlemen here who took a different view of the question; leaders of the Republican party and eminent in its councils, occupying its highest positions; among others the honorable President of the Senate. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] had a proposition to reduce the time for the exclusion of the Chinese from twenty to ten years. Mr. MILLER, of California, said:

I find it will be impossible to get a vote this afternoon. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] desires to speak on Monday, so the Senator from Kansas need not restrict himself at all.

Whereupon the Senator from Kansas proceeded to say:

Mr. INGALLS. I will then, Mr. President, briefly and more in the nature of a statement, without argument or giving special reasons, suggest two or three amendments that I think good faith toward the Government of China requires to be incorporated in this bill.

It will be observed, by the language of the article I have read, that this prohibition shall not be absolute, and that it shall be reasonable, and the first point to which I desire to call attention is one suggested by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and that is the period prescribed within which this prohibition shall be operative, namely, twenty years after the promulgation of this legislation. I shall move to amend the bill in that particular by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting "ten," and for two or three reasons.

In the first place, it is apparent to my mind that this legislation is invoked under the influence of overmastering passions. Whether justly or unjustly, public opinion upon the Pacific Slope, by importunate and inflammatory appeals, has been wrought to that heat of passion that we are not at this time, I believe, capable of taking an entirely unbiased and unprejudiced view of what the social and economical requirements of the country in regard to this question are. The period of ten years will allow a sufficient time to elapse in which the passions of men will subside. It will allow another census to be taken under which we shall be able to contrast the statistics of labor and of production under the condition of things as it now exists and that which will obtain when Chinese immigration has been prohibited; and beside this it will, in my judgment, comport more absolutely with that fair dealing which we are under obligation to observe toward the Government of China, in declaring that this prohibition shall not be absolute. The insertion of the period of twenty years appears to me to be an infraction of the agreement in the first article of this treaty that the suspension shall not be absolute. I shall therefore hope that the Senate will agree to the modification suggested by the reduction of the period named from twenty years to ten.

Again, on page 1712 of the same volume, the Senator from Kansas further, in support of his amendment, made the following remarks:

Mr. President, in support of the amendment that I have offered, it is only necessary that I should call the attention of the Senate to the language of the fourth article of the treaty:

"The high contracting powers having agreed upon the foregoing articles, whenever the Government of the United States shall adopt legislative measures in accordance therewith, such measures will be communicated to the Government of China."

If those words mean anything, if they have any significance whatever, the meaning is that whatever legislation we enact, before it shall become operative, shall be communicated to the Government of China for the purpose of receiving, so far as it may, the approbation of that government, because the section proceeds further to say:

"If the measures as enacted are found to work hardships upon the subjects of China the Chinese minister at Washington may bring the matter to the notice of the Secretary of State of the United States, who will consider the subject with him; and the Chinese foreign office may also bring the matter to the notice of the United States minister at Pekin and consider the subject with him, to the end that mutual and unqualified benefit may result."

Mr. President, in the interest of good faith to the Government of China, which has made in the Burlingame treaty and in the treaty of 1868 concessions that were never made to any other people, I ask that this amendment may receive the sanction of the Senate, because unless these odious provisions are in some way modified it will be impossible for me under the declarations that I have previously made to support this bill. I believe there are others who feel the same as I do myself, and I believe that those who favor this bill, those who believe that the interests of the Pacific States require the passage of the bill, will promote the success of this measure by agreeing to such modifications as will adapt it to those who believe that public faith requires some essential modification.

Now, Mr. President, I shall read from a Senator to whom we always listen with great pleasure and great instruction, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], who seems to have imbibed the Massachusetts idea on this subject, that the best thing you could do for a Chinaman was to infuse Christianity into him, and the best thing you could do for the Massachusetts people in connection with the Chinaman was to cheapen his labor, so if you made a Christian of him and got his labor cheap he filled the bill exactly. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said:

Mr. President, I am aware that the friends of this measure are impatient for a vote, and that in their opinion the debate is exhausted. I can not therefore expect, however courteous they may be, to receive a very attentive hearing from them; but, sir, believing that in nothing are the friends of this measure more mistaken than in the belief that they have exhausted and ended the debate upon the questions which they have raised by this measure, however little I may be able to contribute to that debate, I am compelled by a sense of duty to utter what I may, as briefly as under the circumstances it is possible for me, in protest against this measure.

There is some advantage as well as disadvantage in looking at the subject-matter of this debate at a distance. If one does not feel so keenly the evils out of which this legislation has sprung, and fails to be affected by the prejudice and passion and feeling that control those more closely in contact with it, nevertheless a clearer vision of the character of the proposed remedy and a calmer judgment upon its nature and its consequences are some compensation to those who look at it from a distance.

Mr. President, it is confessed upon the record here by supporters of this legislation that it "is invoked under the influence of overmastering passions. Whether justly or unjustly, public opinion upon the Pacific Slope, by importunate and inflammatory appeals, has been wrought to that heat of passion that we are not at this time," in the opinion of such supporters, "capable of taking an entirely unbiased and unprejudiced view of what the social and economical requirements of the country in regard to this question are."

If this confession of supporters of the measure itself were not furnished us in debate here as the lesson, what we have witnessed this morning, sent here over the wires from California and Nevada, and Oregon I believe, furnishes ample proof of the statement. There can be no doubt that what the supporters of the bill call a white heat pervades that people; whether, as is said, rightly or wrongly, its existence can not be ignored and its effect upon our deliberations can not be disregarded. What should it teach us? Hasty, unquestioned acquiescence in demands made under the impulse of overmastering passion, or calm, considerate delay, not diminished, if not increased, as one sees that all reason or judgment upon existing facts in the locality that invokes this legislation at our hands is swallowed up in a blind and furious darkening passion? And yet what are we told by such supporters of this measure is this lesson, on the other hand, to be taught us as a duty here in this Senate Chamber from the voice that comes up from out of the heat of an overmastering passion?

Such supporters tell us that they are not disposed at this time "to dwell upon what seem" to their minds to be "the economical and what may be called the sentimental objections to this legislation." They tell you, sir, when making the very confession to which I have called your attention, that their "instincts revolt at it," and that they would "as soon think of destroying all the mules or all the domestic animals in the country, or of destroying all the engines and labor-saving machinery in the country, as to either expel or repel a class of docile, patient, obedient, frugal, and industrious laborers, whether skilled or unskilled."

Mr. MILLER, of California. Will the Senator allow me to ask whom he is quoting from?

Mr. DAWES. Quoting from a Senator here in his seat, declaring that he would vote for this measure.

Mr. MILLER, of California. What Senator was it?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS]. The same Senator further instructs us as to our duty out of this measure and out of the circumstances under which it comes into existence here before this body.

"But," says he, "I pass that, because"—

Hear this!

"because conceding to other localities the same rights that I demand for my own, and resting upon the maxims and dogmas of local self-government and home rule, I am prepared to say that the communities upon the Pacific coast—

"Whom I have described as at this moment under an overmastering passion"—

"have a right to judge for themselves as to the propriety in an economical sense of this immigration, and when they have spoken through their authorized representatives, with their declaration I shall be content."

The only condition upon which such supporters of this legislation have declared that their support shall be given to it, from which their very instincts revolt, is that they shall not be required to stand it over ten years.

Mr. TELLER. I would ask the Senator by what authority he says that no one supports the bill except upon that theory? Did he not hear me distinctly announce that I did not support it upon any such theory?

Mr. DAWES. I have not forgotten the ground the Senator from Colorado took, but I should like to inquire of the Senator what he put that question to me for.

Mr. TELLER. I put it because the Senator has made the assertion to go to the country that nobody supports this bill in this Senate except because the people of California want it. That I understand to be his position.

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that the Senator did so understand me, because I did not say so. I said the only condition that such supporters of this measure demanded was that they were not required to endure that at which their very instincts revolted longer than ten years. I am aware that the Senator from Colorado put his support of this bill upon an entirely different and it seems to me quite as indefensible a ground, which I hope that I may not forget before I get through.

Mr. TELLER. I hope not.

Mr. DAWES. So, sir, the voice of these States thus expressed is our command. The basis, the ground for this legislation is stated in the bill itself. Those who framed it have chosen in their frankness, for which I commend them, to tell the world what necessity there is for it; and it is in these brief words:

"Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, etc."

"In the opinion of the Government of the United States." We are told by Senators that instead of taking their own instincts as their guide to their duty here as Senators of the United States they are to take an expression of it from a locality controlled by an overmastering passion. My friend on my right [Mr. JONES, of Nevada] inquires how I know it is a fact. The Senator did not hear me read the confession of supporters of this bill, to which I would add and did add the evidence which Senators have themselves produced here this morning of a legal holiday enacted on the Pacific coast for the purpose of gathering together whatever could be put into the form of a testimony here, and telegraphed to the Senate of the United States as instructions to them upon their duty.

Mr. President, the whole basis of this legislation is that the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers good order in certain localities. It is not that Chinese laborers are here; that Chinese laborers are working evil in the midst of any locality in these United States; it is not that any evil has grown out of their coming here in the past, for all who have come here, by express provision of this bill, up to the time it shall take effect are to remain here unmolested, to work out such effect upon our institutions, social and political, as they may, undisturbed; but it is the coming of Chinese laborers here that endangers good order. No one has told us how the coming of Chinese laborers here endangers good order; nor does any one tell us whether they endanger good order by being themselves the disturbers of order, or whether they endanger good order merely by being the temptation to some sand-lot irrepressible to cast a stone at inoffensive and docile human beings.

That is not explained. I have never known produced here as evidence of the disturbance of good order in any of these communities that any of these docile laborers have ever assaulted any one or committed a breach of the peace against any individual; but I have heard everywhere that they have been the occasion of other people committing breaches of the peace and disturbing good order, and it is on that account that they must be removed, upon the principle that the justice fined Mr. Jones for getting Mr. Smith so mad in court that Mr. Smith in-sulted the court. [Laughter.] They have no business to be where any irresponsible community, disregarding the peace and good order, are tempted by their presence to disturb it.

Therefore, as the basis of this bill, the coming of Chinese laborers here gives somebody an opportunity to disturb the peace, and they must be stopped and the temptation removed—a liberal construction of the Lord's prayer, "Lead us not into temptation."

Further along in the debate the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] said:

We have promised that if we undertake to legislate we will legislate by some reasonable limitation of the manner of importing Chinamen, but we will not absolutely prohibit it, and we say in the treaty that we will do it without contravening the spirit of the old treaty. The difficulty with the spirit of the old treaty was that it declared in so many words that they should come without limit, and not only should come without limit, but should be protected here in the enjoyment of every right that any citizen of the United States could claim of protection under the laws and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SLATER. I should like to call the Senator's attention, if he will permit me, to the fact that the limitation in the Burlingame treaty was that they were to enjoy in the United States all those rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel and residence alone. Those are the restrictive words, and they are found in no other treaty.

Mr. DAWES. That, I think, includes about all that a man could desire, short of political privileges and rights. He shall be protected in his home, in his residence, which shall be his castle, and in going to and fro whenever he listeth throughout the United States. But the Senator will go along with me a little further. We have told them, we have solemnly covenanted, as I said, that while we may put reasonable limitations and regulations upon immigration, we will not absolutely prohibit it. In this bill we do not absolutely prohibit, for twenty years, any Chinese labor from coming; we only declare that if he does come he shall go to the penitentiary. That is all. We do not absolutely prohibit, from and after this bill takes effect, a Chinese laborer coming to the United States; we only declare that if he does come he shall go to the penitentiary. That is all. I knew a man once who told his son, "I do not absolutely prohibit you from going to the circus to-day, but I tell you that if you do I will horsewhip you." That is all. That is the legislation in the spirit of the Burlingame treaty. No, we will not absolutely prohibit you, but if one of you puts his foot upon the soil of free America, though innocent of guile as a saint, with purpose as praiseworthy as ever actuated an immigrant to these shore, though you come with a sincere desire to identify yourself with our institutions and obey our laws and make a home for yourself and for your children, if you undertake to do it with the labor of your own hands, you shall find yourself in the penitentiary.

That is the spirit of the Burlingame treaty! And that, these gentlemen say is, whether it be of the Burlingame treaty or not, the spirit and the letter of the law we are called upon this day to record our votes in favor of. I do not wonder the Senator from Kansas said that his very instincts revolted from it. I only wonder that he could find it consistent with his duty afterward to say that he would be willing to take it if he were not required to endure it longer than ten years.

Sir, one thing more. It is "Chinese laborers" that disturb the good order of certain localities in the United States. It is not Chinese per se. If a Chinaman will come here and only pledge himself to be idle, if he come here clothed in "purple and fine linen," if he brings with him an army of adherents, he may travel throughout the length and breadth of the land; if he will agree to keep a gambling shop, though it be under the very shadow of the sanctuary, though he and his followers darken the sun with the rabble that come and occupy their dens where they smoke in idleness their opium and play cards and gamble and toss up upon the venture of the die, though they bring vile women with them, provided they do not work for a living, they may come.

Yes, as is suggested by my colleague, they can even join the bands of saints in California that throw stones at Chinese laborers, saying, "None of this; procul, O! procul este profani; get behind me, ye hordes of Satan; let the godly people of Massachusetts and Rhode Island and the other States of this Union enjoy the elevating influence and pious association of all other Chinese; but do not let them be contaminated by one who is vile enough to earn his living by labor!"

That is this bill. Is there not as much danger to society, to social and political institutions in this land, from the arrival of an idle, worthless, dissipated Mongolian, as there is from the humble, docile laborer who earns his daily bread by the sweat of his brow and uses those earnings for what he consumes and what he wears?

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] on the 8th of March, 1882, came very near quitting the Republican party on account of this measure, I am sorry to say. He said:

I am told that I am committed to the passage of this bill by the action of the Republican party to which I belong. I do not so understand it. I do not know how others may regard it. I speak here to-day for myself and not for the Republican party; but I do not understand that the Republican party is committed to any such bill as this.

He understands it now, of course, from its present platform. There is no difficulty about it now; that is all squared up. They have made such a tremendous march since the Burlingame treaty that they have got clear around to the antipodes; they have circumnavigated the globe on this question.

Mr. PLATT. If the Republican party does right now, it is hardly fair to taunt it with previous delinquencies.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said further:

I do not understand that the Republican party, which has a glorious record of having stood all these long years for the natural rights of man, having planted itself on the Declaration of Independence, and the principles there enumerated as upon an immovable rock, and said that they should become the guiding spirit of this Republic, has ever committed itself to any proposition that no man shall come to this country to labor unless he is white. This is what the Republican party at its convention said:

"Since the authority to regulate immigration and intercourse between the United States and foreign nations rests with the Congress of the United States and the treaty-making power, the Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as a matter of grave concernment, under the exercise of both these powers, would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane, and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result."

That was the breaking down of the tissue; that was the giving way of the structure upon which the Burlingame treaty was formed. But they have thoroughly melted now, and, like they do on almost all occasions when they find there is anything to be made by it, they have run right in and taken the front row; they have outheroded Herod. There is nobody to be found now in the United States who is such a pronounced, inveterate, unconquerable, irreclaimable opponent of the importation of Chinese labor here as the distinguished leaders of the Republican party in the United States.

The old Democratic party has been doing a great deal of good after all, for we have at last converted the Republican party of this country to the idea that this is really a white man's country and an American's country; that Almighty God intended it for the habitation of the great composite race here, composed of the Angles, the Saxons, the Scotch, the French, and whoever else come here, who belong, however, to the right blood. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] once said in a debate on this floor that this country belongs to that class of people "who always breed upward and not downward."

Mr. BECK. I believe in that.

Mr. MORGAN. You believe in that. That is the Kentucky idea and I think it is a very good one. The Democratic party, however, has absolutely converted the whole Republican party to its faith and sponged out the Burlingame treaty with all its nonsense and parade of affectation of a desire to Christianize the pagans on this side of the earth. They have sponged it out and left the record free that this is a country a white man can afford to live in and labor in without having the competition of some miserable blear-eyed, curious, half-starved, pagan Chinaman. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] hands me a report of the late Senator Morton, "Views of the late Oliver P. Morton," published as Miscellaneous Document of the Senate, No. 20, Forty-fourth Congress, second session. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, to accompany Senate Report No. 689, second session Forty-fourth Congress." "These views," a note says, "were written in sections. The missing sections are indicated below." Section A is missing. What I am about to read occurs in section B, on page 4. Mr. Morton said:

But before entering upon the discussion of any other principles, I may be permitted to observe that, in my judgment, the Chinese can not be protected in the Pacific States while remaining in their alien condition. Without representation in the legislature or Congress, without a voice in the selection of officers, and surrounded by fierce, and in many respects, unscrupulous enemies, the law will be found insufficient to screen them from persecution. Complete protection can be given them only by allowing them to become citizens and acquire the right of suffrage, when their votes would become important in elections, and their persecutions, in great part, converted into kindly solicitation.

Again, on page 5, in section C, he said:

In the construction of railroads and other public works of California the Chinese have been of the greatest service and have performed the largest part of the labor. Several distinguished gentlemen connected with railroads testified that without Chinese labor they could not have been constructed, and that if the companies had been compelled to rely upon white labor it would have been so difficult to procure and so costly that the works must have been abandoned, and, in fact, would not have been undertaken. As laborers upon the public works they were entirely reliable; worked more hours than white men; were not given to strikes, and never undertook, by combinations, to control the price of labor.

I read again on page 8. After a discussion of the Burlingame treaty, Articles V, VI, and VII, Mr. Morton proceeded to say:

In the foregoing articles we find a strong recognition of the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and his allegiance, and that Chinese subjects, visiting or residing in the United States, shall possess the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be here enjoyed by the citizens and subjects of the most favored nation. When this treaty was concluded with China it was regarded by the whole nation as a grand triumph of American diplomacy and principles, and Mr. Burlingame, on his return to San Francisco, received an extraordinary ovation as a benefactor of his country by having secured to Americans the protection of the Chinese Government, and the right to live there and trade (in return for which he had guarantied similar rights for the Chinese in the United States), and for having secured from China a recognition of what many called the "great American doctrine" of the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and his allegiance. For the recognition of this doctrine by the governments of Europe we had been struggling, by negotiations, ever since we had a national existence, and had succeeded with them, one by one. And within the last eight years we have secured the recognition of the doctrine by Germany and other states of Europe, that had long held out against us.

In section H of this report or memorandum occurs the following:

The evidence established the fact that Chinese labor in California is as free as any other. They all come as free men and are their own masters absolutely. In many cases they borrow their passage-money in China, with an agreement to repay from their earnings in this country, with large interest, an agreement which, to their credit be it said, they rarely fail to perform. Nearly all of them upon their arrival become members of one or the other of the Six Companies in San Francisco, for which they pay an initiation fee, and through that they do their business, make their contracts for labor, make remittances to China, deposit their money, and make arrangements for the return of their bones to China, should they die. They are much given to corporations and companies, and understand well the power and advantage of combination.

They are right here in the presence of this trust age, and I suppose they will be pretty lively on that.

They frequently work together in associations under the direction of a head man, who keeps their accounts and transacts their business. The most of the Chinese who come here are young men and boys. A few families have come, but nearly all of the men are unmarried. About five thousand Chinese women have come, the most of them prostitutes, imported by procurers, who manage and dispose of them on their arrival. The better and the greater part of the Chinese are opposed to this degrading and destructive traffic, and have made repeated efforts to abolish it.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Alabama to let me read a line in that connection from the report of the Committee on Chinese Immigration in 1876.

Mr. MORGAN. I will hear the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I desire to read a line in this connection which will perhaps show why so many of the Republican leaders, the distinguished attorneys and counselors and advisers of the great Pacific Railroad, took so much interest in the Chinese question. In the report of the Joint Committee on Chinese Immigration, second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, it appears that they called before them among others Mr. Frank M. Pixley, representing the municipality of San Francisco, and on page 15 of the report Mr. Pixley said, among other things:

The third interrogatory is, "Do they come here voluntarily, and by what means do they get here?"

After speaking of the Six Chinese Companies and the efforts they made, he said:

The Central Pacific Railroad demanded ten thousand of these laborers, and this demand was greater than the market afforded. Through the Six Companies they sent their money to China, and brought them here, and that is the way in which they came.

That will, perhaps, account for the anxiety at that time of so many of those gentlemen who were advocates of American industries.

Mr. DAWES. It shows it perfectly clearly.

Mr. BECK. Perfectly clearly. I can understand why they were so much opposed to the bill which was passed in the last Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senate got to voting on the question, and with an amendment pending, "That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed," the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] said:

I wish to say a word upon the amendment. I have kept silence on this bill of iniquities as long as I can endure it. I have no very long speech to make, but I have a few observations to submit.

Afterwards he proceeded to submit the observations, and they were very strong observations, upon the section 16 which was proposed, "That hereafter no State court or court of the United States shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed." The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] said:

Mr. President, when I rose last night it was with the purpose of speaking but a very few moments upon the points specially before us. I confess I regret now that I did not sooner entertain a purpose to speak upon the bill, that I might put in good shape my serious objections to its general character. But I shall not detain the Senate long, for I know that members are anxious to dispose of the question, and yet it is one of such importance that I feel that I am not at all guilty of any serious wrong in insisting upon deliberate consideration.

I admit the doctrine that has been set forth here, that a nation is in some sense a family, and that there is a right and duty of national self-protection. I think we all assert that; nobody denies it. No dispute arises upon such a proposition until we come to the extent of that principle and the details of propositions.

A nation has a right to exclude paupers sent in upon it. That is not a voluntary immigration; it is an injurious one. It has a right, of course, to exclude insane and idiotic persons for the same reason. It has a right to exclude criminals, for they are sent here to our injury, and in order to relieve other nations from their own just burdens.

If the British Government, instead of resolutely setting about the suppression of thugism, had offered a free passage to thugs to come here and settle with us, with their religion teaching the duty of murder, of course we should have had a right to forbid that kind of immigration, and we should have been quite justified in taking it as offensive action on the part of Great Britain. So in a state of war or prospect of war—that justifies the exercise of extraordinary powers; inter arma silent leges. Laws national or international are set aside if we can defend ourselves, and any class of people may be excluded or any foreigners may be ordered to depart, the measure of the exercise of the power being only the degree of the necessity of self-protection.

But we are legislating for times of peace. We are legislating professedly upon the general and not the exceptional principles that are to be justified by our Constitution, by the spirit of our laws, the national spirit, character, and policy that we have freely and boastfully set forth to the whole world for a century; which have elicited the admiration and the pride of all generous souls; which are bringing to our shores this very year nearly a million of people; and which are very sensibly modifying the political aspirations and possibilities of all Europe. In this matter we are to make a change.

After some colloquial debate between Mr. Miller and Mr. HAWLEY, the latter proceeded to say:

This is all there is of the preamble:

"Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers"—

They might be doves, for all the proposed law says. They might be the messengers of peace; the messengers of a new gospel better than ours. They had something like the golden rule long before our Christian peoples knew anything of it, or before there were Christian peoples.

Mr. GEORGE. Who says that?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY]. I am reading from him:

These men, I say, might be bringing a new gospel here.

"Whereas in the opinion of the Government of the United States the coming of Chinese laborers to this country endangers the good order of certain localities within the territory thereof."

That is the whole preamble. It is not pretended therein that they could exercise a bad influence over the whole country, to poison our people against our institutions and beliefs, to damage us politically, socially, or commercially, as a nation at all, but that their coming endangers the good order of certain localities. What is the obvious implication? That if the Chinaman comes our citizens may insult him, that they may raise tumults, trample upon law, that perhaps they may kill him, or perhaps they may forcibly expel him, or they may so hedge him about with fear that he would rush down in despair to the seacoast and beg to be transported home. That is the implication of the preamble. His coming here is going to make us so angry, so fierce that we will raise up in rebellion and trample upon our own laws and wrong this man who is not charged with any dangerous purpose whatever.

I do not enter upon the argument at length that this proposed law is in violation of the treaty just made, and yet I consider it to be so. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] has done ample justice to that subject; but at this moment, glancing over the papers in the case, come across a significant paragraph that I have not heard quoted in the debate. Perhaps it was. If it will not trouble the Senate I will read briefly two paragraphs, one from the communication from our commissioners, Messrs. Angell and others, announcing their successful negotiation of the treaty, and the other from the proclamation of Mr. Evarts announcing the treaty. The commissioners said:

"After our first interview with the Chinese commissioners"—

I should like attention to this, if it has not been before read—

"After our first interview with the Chinese commissioners we thought it clear that while the Chinese Government would recognize the propriety of some regulating discretion as to Chinese immigration on the part of the Government of the United States, it would not consent to its formal prohibition and the absolute abrogation of the provisions of the Burlingame treaty relating to the free intercourse between the people of the two countries. We did not think that the public opinion of the United States would require so extreme a demand, and we considered our instructions as warning us not to disregard the traditional policy of the United States, and in your own words"—

This is addressed to the Secretary of State—

"to give due weight to 'the widely diffused, and, so to speak, natural sentiment of our people in favor of the most liberal admission of foreign immigrants who desire to incorporate themselves and their families with our society, and mingle the stream of their posterity in the swelling tide of native population.'"

So the commissioners went there to China disavowing a desire to prohibit, because it would not be in accord with our "traditional policy." When Mr. Evarts came to announce the treaty he said:

"The treaty submitted settles the questions raised between the two countries in a manner alike honorable and satisfactory to both. While preserving to the subjects of China engaged in mercantile pursuits, in study, in teaching, or in travel for curiosity, the right of free intercourse with this country, the Chinese Government has recognized in the Government of the United States the right to regulate, limit, and suspend the introduction into its territory of Chinese labor whenever, in its discretion, such introduction shall threaten the good order of any locality or endanger any interests of society."

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] further proceeded:

It is not put into the preamble here, as it might have been from the treaty, that their coming here would endanger, would affect injuriously the interests of society. The treaty says, anything that would "affect the interests of society," being an obvious inelegance, when the writers intended to say, "affect injuriously," etc., but even that is not inserted in the preamble.

This pamphlet shows also how carefully the Chinese desired to guard against an absolute prohibition, how cautious they were that a suspension should be only suspension. These official papers of the commissioners to the Secretary of State show that nothing in the nature of prohibition was intended. But suspension for twenty years is prohibition, and is intended as such.

The bill before us is very clearly a harsh and an extravagant interpretation of that treaty, just what the Chinese commissioners feared might be made, and what our commissioners assured them that our just and magnanimous and generous nation ought to be trusted not to do.

The civilized world jeered at China and Japan while they applied this identical policy to all the world outside their borders, and the civilized world gradually grew ready to bombard both China and Japan into international comity and good fellowship. The United States was proud that one of our citizens, a gallant and eloquent citizen of Massachusetts, became the agent and ambassador in unlocking her doors and shaking hands with the rest of mankind. In the supplementary treaty of July 23, 1868, it was William H. Seward, speaking for the United States, and Anson A. Burlingame, speaking for China, who said:

"ARTICLE V.

"The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents.

* * * * * * *

"ARTICLE VI.

"Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation."

To gain these things the civilized world bombarded China, and they granted them; and the civilized world, this part of it, appears to be sick of its bargain.

Singularly enough, I accidentally discovered this morning that the 28th of July, 1868, was the very day on which the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution was declared adopted, which for the first time really made every one born in the United States or naturalized therein a citizen not only of his State but of the United States. It was after that indeed that we ourselves by the fifteenth amendment, adopted March 30, 1870, declared that no person should be forbidden to vote by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Our zealous and radical republicanism is fading. Our apostleship of a generous humanity is to be abdicated. It was before the war that a Massachusetts man declared the Declaration "glittering generalities." He died, sir. I do not remember when he was buried; he died the day he said that.

It is seventeen years after a great war for union and liberty and the freeing of four million slaves, fourteen years after the assertion of national citizenship, and some twelve years after a declaration that no man shall be forbidden to vote by reason of race, color, etc., that we are asked to deny to the Chinaman the right he was bombarded into accepting; and upon that solemn act of legislation we put only the words I have read, saying that his coming as a laborer is dangerous to good order here.

Now, on page 1748 of the same volume of the RECORD will be found some remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who I suppose will be recognized as a Republican leader, although he seems to lead better for somebody else than he does for himself sometimes, but he certainly leads. He said:

It does seem to me that this bill might have been limited, restrained in such terms that it might have prevented the threatened evils without seeming to violate a treaty and to go in hot haste in a new policy that is foreign to the general habits of our people and of our country. I have voted for and would still vote for the amendments that have been proposed to limit and restrain the words of this bill. I think a suspension of twenty years is in violation of the spirit of the treaty, as we gather it from the correspondence that is laid on our table. The treaty itself expressly provides:

"Whenever, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein, affects or threatens to affect the interests of that country, or to endanger the good order of the said country or of any locality within the territory thereof, the Government of China agrees that the Government of the United States may regulate, limit, or suspend such coming or residence, but may not absolutely prohibit it. The limitation or suspension shall be reasonable."

Continues Mr. SHERMAN:

How is it possible to go further than it is proposed to go by this bill? Not only is restraint put upon all immigration of Chinese into this country, except those who are professors or teachers or merchants, but that immigration is suspended absolutely for twenty years. Is that a reasonable exercise of the powers granted by this treaty? It seems to me it is going too far. I think there ought to be a shorter trial of such an act as this. A suspension for five years would accomplish all the beneficial purposes proposed by this bill. It may be that at the end of five years the people of California will themselves demand the useful labor of many of the Chinese. They may by that time have learned to discriminate between the labor of skilled artisans, shrewd, able men such as exist in China, and the coolies that have been sent over here, the criminals, the paupers, the contract laborers, who ought to be excluded from this country whether they come from Asia or from Europe.

Mr. FARLEY. Does the honorable Senator from Ohio desire to have brought to this country skilled laborers from China to compete with our own skilled laborers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to go too far in this new policy which reverses the whole policy of the Government from the foundation. I want to go slowly. What is the evil to be guarded against? The people of California and the Pacific coast say that they are fearful of being inundated by a vast horde of hungry coolies or contract laborers—I call them coolies—ignorant, vicious, debased, who come here without wives and children, who come here to degrade our society, an immigration of the lowest and worst classes of the oldest nation of Asia. It seems to me we might guard against the evils of this dangerous immigration without going to the extreme of excluding all laborers from China. We may limit, restrain, suspend, but we must not prohibit immigration. Here is a prohibition for twenty years, longer than the life of any Senator on this floor, for in twenty years' time all of us will have disappeared from the stage in all human probability.

Now, Mr. President, it is not useful perhaps to proceed with the votes on this question. It might be an interesting inquiry as to how far your present candidate for President of the United States was committed in this matter. All the RECORD shows, so far as I can see, is that he was paired with Mr. Maxey, who was a warm friend to the bill and opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas and also that of the Senator from Massachusetts, and Mr. Maxey stated his pair and on one occasion said that Mr. Harrison had informed him that he was against the provision of one of the amendments, and Mr. Maxey declined to vote on account of that pair.

Now, coming down to May 26, 1886, that period that concerns the Senator from Oregon so much about the conduct of the House, on page 4958 of the same volume I find:

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1991) supplementary to and amendatory of "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, as amended by an act to amend said act, approved July 5, 1884.

And after getting the question before the Senate, and so on,

The first amendment was to strike out section 1, as follows:

"That on and after ninety days after this act takes effect, every Chinese laborer who, having been in the United States, has departed therefrom and remained absent from the United States for a period of two years, shall be deemed, taken, and held to have elected to remain permanently out of the United States, and to have waived and abandoned his right to return thereto under the provisions of any treaty existing between the United States and the Empire of China; and it shall not be lawful for any such Chinese laborer to return to the United States during the period prescribed for the suspension of the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States; and all the provisions of this act, and of the acts to which this act is amendatory and supplementary, relating to the exclusion of Chinese laborers, shall be applicable to the Chinese laborers so excluded by this section."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"That the words 'Chinese laborer' and 'Chinese laborers,' wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean any laborer of the Chinese race, without regard to the Government to which such laborer may owe allegiance, and without regard to the port, place, or country from which such laborer may come to the United States; and the words 'Chinese passenger,' wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean all persons of the Chinese race, without regard to the government to which they may owe allegiance, or the port, place, or country from which they may come to the United States."

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from Ohio who reported this bill does not propose to address the Senate further. I think I ought not to let the occasion pass without at least expressing my own protest with regard to this entire proceeding.

This proposed act, and the statute of which it is an amendment, and the treaty which those two statutes profess to carry into effect, will in my judgment be regarded, if civilization be preserved on this continent, in future ages as among the great blots on the history of the human race. Here is legislation aimed at men, not on account of any individual crime or inferiority or fault, but simply because they are laborers and because they belong to a certain race; and that in defiance of the two great foundation principles of this Republic: that labor is honorable, and that there ought to be no distinction between human beings in their privileges on account of race.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not hear the Senator where I sit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that complaint is made that the Senator from Alabama can not be heard. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are unable to hear the Senator even at this short distance either from the noise or because he reads in such a low tone.

Mr. MORGAN. I am doing the best I can after having been on the floor a couple of hours.

Mr. MITCHELL. When did the proceedings take place from which the Senator is reading?

Mr. MORGAN. May 26, 1886.

Mr. MITCHELL. When he was a member of the other House?

Mr. MORGAN. No, it was in 1886. He was then in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator said 1876.

Mr. MORGAN. On page 4961 I will read some expressions from the President of the Senate [Mr. INGALLS]:

Mr. INGALLS. It seems extraordinary to me that at this hour of the day a bill of this magnitude should be brought in here by an arrangement with a Senator who already had another bill pending and slipped into a crevice of time——

Mr. HOAR. What Senator?

Mr. INGALLS. I am talking about the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Van Wyck]. I say slipped into a crevice of time and railroaded through this body, containing provisions as extraordinary and multifarious as these are here. The Senator from Ohio states that he does not desire to renew the discussion of four years ago and accuses the Senator from Massachusetts of knight-errantry, intimating that he is a Don Quixote fighting windmills, and perhaps that I am his Sancho Panza [laughter], because we venture to ask that a great measure of this kind, which I affirm is a disgrace to American civilization, shall not be passed through here without discussion, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Sewell] who now occupies that chair sotto voce suggests, "if there is no objection this amendment is unanimously agreed to," and nobody knows anything about it.

The Senator from Massachusetts, after three or four amendments had been thus agreed to, arises and expresses his surprise that this arrangement is being completed. And I say, sir, that I did not know until this moment of time that that first amendment had been agreed to. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] says it is my own fault, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] echoes him.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly I do.

Mr. INGALLS. It may be my own fault or it may be not. But so far as this bill is concerned, it will never pass this body without discussion and without examination and without such protest as those of us who do not believe in its principles see fit to utter; and if there is any disposition to take advantage of the situation, I should like to be heard on that as on the rest of the situation here. I protest, sir, against this method of passing this bill and these amendments.

And so it goes. Now, I think, Mr. President, that I have laid before the Senate enough of opinion expressed in the solemn deliberations of this body, which of course we know are always very solemn, to get at the difference between Democratic sentiment on the Chinese question and the Republican sentiment as it has been revealed in these debates, and also outside of them as to the treaty-making arrangements. And, sir, the pretension will not do to set up any longer in the Senate, for the world will see through it and scout it, that the Republican party has any responsibility for the Chinese question on the American continent, except to bring it into this country. Since it got here they have done very little, almost nothing, with a few bright exceptions, under local pressure, possibly, to get rid of it; but we have had to fight a battle of the greatest magnitude, scarcely aided by any Republican, certainly opposed by a number of their statesmen, whose abilities have been very marked, and whose persistence has absolutely been insuperable in opposition to the restriction of Chinese immigration.

I, sir, have always believed that it was a very serious evil to this country. It was my misfortune to have been raised up among the negroes whose ancestors were imported by gentlemen of New England, and distributed along the Atlantic coast. I have had before my mind all the evils that we have had to encounter, which were of the greatest possible magnitude—governmental evils, social evils, economic evils—evils of every description. A contemplation of those evils deterred me from favoring any such enterprise as the bringing of an inferior colored race into this country, and I looked forward to the union between the African and the Chinaman after he should become resident in my section of country as making the very worst possible cross that humanity has ever been afflicted with. It would prove the Darwinian theory, but it would prove it in reversal; for such a mess as would come from this hybrid amalgamation of the negro and the Chinaman in the South nobody, I think, could ever have dreamed of.

So I set my face squarely against this thing all the time, and upon that ground and every other, that I believed the introduction of the Chinaman into this country was the contamination of the whole social fabric.

There is one thing I am very glad of, and that is that it seems they are incapable of making very much impression on our social order here. I think very few white women engage in marriage with them, no matter how prosperous they may be.

Chinamen are not, however, a substratum on which to build up a society in a country like this. We have our own substratum, and it is composed of a prudent and economical people, people of sense and of strong will. And to our people, to the blood that we find incorporated in their veins, no matter how much it may have been surrounded by circumstances of poverty, there is always a welcome to the upper circles of opportunity and to the upper places in the temple of power, of justice, of legislation, or whatever it may be. There are in this Senate Chamber, I dare say—I think I know there are—Senators who have come up from what are called the inferior or humbler class of society, whose fathers and mothers, with themselves, toiled in the field for the bread of life until perhaps fifteen or twenty years of age.

Some of the greatest men who have ever adorned the highest executive, judicial, and military positions in the United States are men of that class. There lies to-day stretched upon the bed of death one of the most glorious generals that ever drew sword from scabbard, a man of great ability, great character, splendid talents, and genius, who in his early days was a little boy seeking to carry errands from man to man—in Ohio I believe it was—for a small compensation. There is no telling what you can work out of true American blood, or Anglo-Saxon blood, or any mixture of that kind that we have got in this country.

And, sir, I protest now and forever against its prostitution and its amalgamation with any of the inferior races that God has made. These two English-speaking nations, which were created to lead this earth, and the people who speak English on this globe to-day have more power than all the remainder of the world put together; and yet in point of numbers they are comparatively few. But the genius of the English-speaking people, their power to lead, to control, to command, to occupy, to possess, is supreme over the remainder of mankind. And even those who are kindred to us in blood, but do not belong exactly to the woof and warp of the English fabric, have to take the second place in this world's work; and they will have to keep it (that is all there is about it) until we voluntarily dispossess ourselves of it.

Having the pride of that blood in my veins, I can not be blamed if I desire to keep it pure. And if there is any one thing for which the people of the United States ought to be thankful to their women above all else, it is for that pure and exquisite virtue that contends for the purity of the blood that flows in their veins and always will. We men, Mr. President, give way, but in the sanctuary of a woman's heart is preserved the sense of responsibility to God and to posterity, which has been the nurturing element of proud strength, and will be the eclipsing glory of this people for ages and ages to come.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that there should have been anything said in this Chamber of a partisan character with regard to this matter.

I am familiar with the history of this question, and the facts of history do not warrant a partisan attack on the Republican party. But in view of what has been said I must be pardoned for telling something of the history of the Chinese in this country.

When they first came to California they were a curiosity. They were a strange people. They engaged in mining in the ravines and gulches which had been previously worked over by the whites, and lived in communities by themselves. They did not enter into the economy of the country, and very little attention was paid to them. Labor was then scarce. The American people that were there at that time performed their own labor in the mines, and the Chinese were not regarded by the people generally as an evil, because there was room enough for all. Some discussion, however, occasionally occurred as to evils that might result from large numbers of Chinese who might come to this country, and the State imposed a foreign miners' tax, which was collected only from the Chinese. Many leading Democrats from the South in early days in California regarded the Chinese as a good substitute for slaves, and advocated their importation by the State to be used in the reclamation of the swamp lands of the State and in the production of rice upon such lands. This suggestion was opposed by the Free-Soil element in both political parties, and soon abandoned. The feeling of the Democratic party and of the people generally on the Chinese question in early times is illustrated by the following proceedings of the State senate of California in 1853, at a time when that body was overwhelmingly Democratic, taken from the senate journal:

Mr. Hager moved a reconsideration of the vote rejecting the resolution recommending to the President of the United States some suitable person, from this State, for the office of commissioner to China; which was agreed to.

Mr. Hager moved to amend by striking out all after the word "China," in the first resolution; which was agreed to.

And the resolution, as amended, read as follows:

"Whereas California is nearer to the empire of China than any other State of the Union, and many thousands of Chinese are now residing in California, and intermingled with our people in all their employments; and

"Whereas a valuable and increasing commerce already exists between California and China, which may hereafter bring a great accession to the wealth of the whole American Union through the ports of California and open the way to a free intercourse with the secluded nations of Asia: Therefore,

"Resolved, That, in our opinion, the public interest would be promoted by the appointment of a citizen of California to the office of 'commissioner to China.'

"Resolved, That the president of the senate be instructed to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolution to the President of the United States."

Mr. Sprague moved to amend by adding after the word "China," the words "Sandwich Islands, Australia, and the South American Republics."

On which the yeas and nays were demanded by Messrs. Sprague, Hubbs, and Lyons, with the following result:

Yeas—Messrs. Lott, Lyons, Sprague, Walkup—4.

Nays—Messrs. Baird, Coffroth, Denver, Gruwell, Hager, Hubbs, Hudspeth, Keene, McKibben, Ralston, Roach, Smith, Wade, Wombough—14.

So the amendment was lost.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and the yeas and nays were demanded by Messrs. Sprague Hubbs, and Lyons, with the following result:

Yeas—Messrs. Baird, Coffroth, Denver, De la Guerra, Gruwell, Hager, Hubbs, Hudspeth, Keene, Lott, Lyons, McKibben, Roach, Smith, Wade, Wombough—16.

Nays—Messrs. Ralston, Sprague, Walkup—3.

So the resolution was adopted.

(See journal California senate, fourth session, 1853, pages 88 and 89.)

I was a resident of California at this time and personally acquainted with every member of the senate, and my recollection is that all those who voted for the resolution above mentioned were Democrats and those voting against it were Whigs. Judge J. S. Hager, who moved the reconsideration of the vote rejecting the resolution, is a Democrat and the present collector of the port of San Francisco, and was formerly a Senator of the United States from California. No man now is a more zealous opponent of Chinese immigration than Judge Hager, and he was one of the first who discovered the Chinese evil, and his consistency in opposition to it can not be questioned. The above quotation is not made in disparagement of Judge Hager, but simply for the purpose of showing the change of sentiment.

Free-Soil Whigs and Free-Soil Democrats in California generally regretted the presence of Chinese on the Pacific coast, fearing that they would form the basis of a new system of slavery, but, labor being scarce, they were not regarded as an inconvenience at the time. They deprived no white people of employment. This condition of things remained substantially the same until Mr. Burlingame went to China and made a treaty. True, observant men saw at this time that there might be trouble, but public opinion was not then aroused against Chinese immigration. Its evils then were not understood even by the people of the Pacific coast.

The Burlingame treaty came to the Senate of the United States for ratification, of which I was at the time a member, and Mr. Conness was then a Republican Senator from California. The terms of the treaty, as we construed it, implied the right of the Chinese to become naturalized. The Republican Senators from the Pacific coast recognized the impropriety of Chinese naturalization. Mr. Conness, to avoid this evil, offered an amendment to the treaty prohibiting the naturalization of Chinese.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. STEWART. I am anxious to dispose of this bill and prefer to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I call the particular attention of Senators to the amendment that was proposed by Senator Conness to the treaty and adopted in executive session, as the journals of the executive session, which are now published, will show.

The following appears on page 355 of volume 16 of the Executive Journal of the Senate:

On motion, by Mr. Conness, to amend the treaty by inserting at the end of Article VI the following words, namely: "But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon the citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States,"

It was determined in the affirmative.

If this amendment, proposed by a Republican Senator, had not been adopted, the Chinese question would be to-day one of the most momentous questions ever presented to the American people. No Democrat proposed to amend the treaty, but all were willing to accept it as negotiated by Mr. Burlingame. The treaty as amended was unanimously adopted. It is too late for the Democratic party to complain of its provisions after its representatives in the Senate accepted it without one word of objection. The only thing that was done in regard to it to protect the people of this country from the naturalization of Chinese was a movement on the part of the Republican Senators and adopted in a Republican Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. Were the yeas and nays called?

Mr. STEWART. No, but the record shows that the vote was unanimous. The record says that the treaty was unanimously passed.

This was in July, 1868. And at this time it will be remembered the question of dealing with the colored man was under consideration. The Republican party had determined to confer suffrage upon the colored man. They saw no other way to place in his hands the means of self-protection. They were in favor of extending equal rights to all men, and they did not then understand, nor did the Democratic party understand, the Chinese question, for it was not even understood on the Pacific coast.

To show that it was not understood upon the Pacific coast I beg to call the particular attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and his Democratic associates to what occurred just before the ratification of the Burlingame treaty. The Chinese embassy who negotiated the treaty in Washington and secured its ratification, while in San Francisco, on their way to Washington, were given a grand banquet at the Lick House, in the former city, in April, 1868, at which the Democratic governor of the State presided. A large number of other distinguished men were present—Democrats and Republicans alike—including ex-Senator Hager, who is now collector of the port at San Francisco, General W. S. Rosecrans, ex-Representative in Congress and now Register of the Treasury, Frank McCoppin, then mayor of San Francisco and now the commissioner of the United States at the Melbourne Exposition, the late ex-Senator John F. Miller, and F. F. Low, ex-Republican governor of California and ex-minister to China. I will incorporate in my remarks a communication which recently appeared in the Argonaut, a weekly journal of San Francisco, in which a partial list is given of the persons who attended that banquet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire that the paper be read?

Mr. STEWART. It is not necessary to read it. It gives the history of a grand banquet in which Republicans and Democrats alike participated. It happened that the most distinguished men there were Democrats, because the administration of the State government at the time was Democratic. Among all the speeches at that banquet there was no suggestion that Chinese immigration was to become an evil. They did not realize the dangers involved in the Chinese question, although the Chinese had been among them for nearly twenty years, and in view of this it seems uncharitable to complain of the people of the East for not understanding the question without time for consideration and investigation.

The following is the communication to which I refer:

THE CHINESE BANQUET IN 1868.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 2, 1888.

Editors Argonaut:

A great deal has lately been said about General Harrison's attitude upon the Chinese question. We wonder if it ever occurred to the people who are responsible for all these malefic rumors—for, of course, an aspirant to office in these days would be nothing if not assailable—that California should be the last place in the world to inculcate a propaganda of that nature. We wonder if it ever occurred to the wiseacres who are responsible for the dissemination of the idea that General Harrison holds erroneous and unpractical ideas upon the Chinese question, to look up a few very significant data upon the views which were held by some of the most prominent citizens of this Republic, and particularly in this portion of it, some twenty years ago. If it has not so occurred, we shall have much pleasure in now informing them. On the 28th of April, 1868, at the Lick House, in San Francisco, took place a banquet which will be still remembered by many of our oldest and worthiest citizens as combining, to a great measure, jollity with business. Hon. Anson C. Burlingame was the recipient of that banquet. The very highest of our respected members of society partook of it. Now this only goes to show that, in those days, a hand of hospitality was outstretched to the Chinese Government, that the Chinese race was welcomed as an honorable and useful part of the political cosmogony of our grand empire, and that no slur attached to those who welcomed them. The gentlemen who represented foreign countries, the United States of America, and San Francisco upon that occasion were known as some of the foremost representative citizens of our time and age. Here is a partial list:

"Governor Haight, Hon. Anson Burlingame, His Excellency Chih Tajen, minister of the second rank; J. McLeary Brown, first secretary of legation; His Excellency Sun Tajen, minister of the second rank; E. de Champs, second secretary of legation; Frank McCoppin, mayor of San Francisco; S. F. Butterworth; Henry Barroilhet, consul of Peru; Don José A. Godoy, consul of Mexico; G. C. Johnson, consul of Norway and Sweden; William L. Booker, consul of the British Empire; Henry W. Halleck, general commanding the division of the Pacific; H. K. Thatcher, admiral commanding the American squadron on this coast; Ogden Hoffman, judge of the district court of the United States; Delos Lake, district attorney of the United States; General McCook, United States minister to the Sandwich Islands; Francis Berton, consul of Switzerland; C. F. Mebius, consul of Bavaria; James de Fremery, consul of Belgium; R. B. Swain, superintendent of the mint; R. G. Sneath, president of the Chamber of Commerce; Thomas H. Selby, president of the Merchants' Exchange; Oliver Eldredge, Alvinza Hayward, James P. Pierce, Eugene L. Sullivan, Judge J. S. Hager, Edward Tompkins, Brigadier-General Leonard, Maj. Gen. W. S. Rosecrans, Charles Meinecke, consul of the Republic of Bremen; Charles E. Hitchcock, consul of the Hawaiian Islands; Maj. Gen. John F. Miller, collector of the port; ex-Governor F. F. Low, Judge Sawyer, of the supreme court; Judge Currey, Senators Tubbs and Rose, W. C. Ralston, ex-Congressman William A. Howard, of Michigan; A. Stanford, Paymaster Doran, Philip W. Stanford, Major-General Ord, Alpheus Bull, and others."

Annexed are extracts from some of the speeches:

General Halleck: "Not many years ago these Asiatic nations were excluded from the pale of European international jurisprudence. It was held by European statesmen, and the doctrine was advocated by John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, that Christian powers had a right to compel these unchristian powers to trade with them in such articles and on such terms as they might see fit to dictate. * * * I regard this as the death of this idea, as one of the most important movements of recent times. It has broken down the barriers of Oriental and Occidental prejudice, and it will eventually lead to the harmony and civilization of the world. * * * If that civilization, which has so long moved westward with the star of empire, is now purified by the principles of true Christianity * * * San Francisco must be made the abutment from which is to be sprung forward the great international law which is to bridge across the Pacific Ocean."

Governor Haight: "A vast commerce is to be developed between China and the other nations of the earth; and California is to be especially benefited by it."

Minister Burlingame: "The fraternal feeling of four hundred millions of people has commenced to flow through the land of Washington to the older nations of the West, and it will flow on forever. Who is there that would check it? Who is there that would say to China: We wish to have no other relations with you than such as we establish on our partial and mean and cruel interests at the cannon's mouth? I trust there are none such as these. I believe rather that this generous nation is a better exponent of the wishes of the West. I believe it represents more truly that large and generous spirit which is not too proud to learn and which is not afraid to teach; that great spirit which, while it would exchange goods with China would also exchange thoughts with China, that would inquire carefully into the cause of that sobriety and industry of which you have made mention, that would learn something of the long experience of that people."

There was no feeling of race hostility in the early days. The Chinaman was looked upon as a very useful accessory to our growing civilization. In short, we as a nation were disposed to grant almost the utmost privileges which it was in our power to bestow upon a race that was then looked upon in the light of innocent, harmless, and useful aliens. The light which has broken in upon us later has shown that the "light of Asia," so far as that light is demonstrated by ignorant and debased coolies of Asiatic birth, is prejudicial to our political life. This is the result of experience gained from a rough and difficult passage over a series of moral and economic stumbling-blocks and snags. But the question, the answer to which must make itself apparent to any reasonable mind, is whether General Harrison was not as perfectly justified in thinking as he did in these days upon the Chinese question as any of the gentlemen who took part in the memorable Burlingame banquet in our city twenty years ago. This casting of stones by people in glass houses is neither just, nor honorable, nor wise.

X. Y. Z.

There was at the time of the ratification of the Burlingame treaty, and there still is, a determination on the part of the Republican party to protect every man in the United States in his civil and political rights. After the fifteenth amendment had been adopted and the Republican party was seeking to enforce its provisions, the question of extending naturalization to the Chinese was discussed and decided after elaborate debate by a Republican Senate against their naturalization.

The question came before the Senate in the following manner:

The House had passed a bill amending the naturalization laws. It was received in the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, then composed of Senators Trumbull, Conkling, EDMUNDS, Carpenter, Rice, Thurman, and myself. Mr. Sumner, then Senator from Massachusetts, offered another bill, which was to strike out the word "white," to the end that there should be no distinction in the right of naturalization on account of race or color. Both these bills were before the Committee on the Judiciary at the same time. I had seen something of the Chinese, and realized their incompatibility with our civilization. There was a movement then on foot to import them into the South, as I will show, by a man named Koopmanschap, to substitute them in that section of the country for colored laborers. People were also talking about using them in Massachusetts. To me then the full force of the evil became apparent—that we were dealing with a race that would overrun this country and subvert its institutions if their coming was not arrested.

The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Trumbull, proposed in the committee to incorporate in the House bill Mr. Sumner's bill to naturalize Chinese and report the two propositions in one bill. I opposed the amendment and the committee agreed with me that it ought not to be incorporated in the House bill, but should be reported as a separate measure. Senator Thurman and myself were opposed to any proposition extending the right of naturalization to Chinese. I do not now recollect how the other members of the committee stood, but a majority were in favor of Mr. Sumner's bill and reported it to the Senate as a separate bill. The House bill was amended and also reported. The latter bill was first called up for consideration in the Senate and after some discussion it was by unanimous consent agreed that on the 2d of July, 1870, at half past 5 o'clock, a vote should be taken on the House bill without further debate. At the time appointed for the final vote on the bill, and while votes were being taken on the several amendments, and when debate was at an end, Mr. Sumner offered his bill, as an amendment to the House bill, to strike out the word "white," so that there should be no distinction as to the right of naturalization on account of race or color.

I shall quote from the Globe of July 2, 1870, second session of the Forty-first Congress, to show the method pursued to force the adoption of Mr. Sumner's amendment without debate. The discussion of this point of order was the turning-point of the Chinese question, for if we had been compelled to take the vote without debate the Chinese would have been naturalized. If this could not have been prevented in the Senate both the Senate and the House would have adopted Sumner's amendment and the Pacific coast to-day would be subject to Chinese rule. Senator Thurman, who was opposed to the naturalization of either negroes or Chinese, joined his powerful influence with Senators Sumner and Trumbull to choke off debate. I had explained the situation to him in the committee and he thoroughly agreed with me in opposition to the naturalization of Chinese, but for the purpose of injuring the Republican party on the Pacific coast he joined in a scheme of parliamentary tactics to stifle debate, which if successful he well knew would extend naturalization to the Chinese.

The following are extracts from the debate:

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a new section which has already been reported upon favorably by the Judiciary Committee:

"And be it further enacted, That all acts of Congress relating to naturalization be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the word 'white' wherever it occurs, so that in naturalization there shall be no distinction of race or color."

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to inquire if this is an amendment to the House bill, or to the amendment of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I move it now to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.—Congressional Globe, second session Forty-first Congress, part 6, page 5121.

* * * * * * *

Mr. STEWART. Now, before the vote is taken, I wish to state that if that question, which is another question altogether, is introduced now to be voted upon, without giving a word of explanation, I shall not be bound by any agreement, because this is another proposition; it does not relate to the subject of the original bill. It is a separate proposition. If that is to be put on this bill, then we are not bound by any arrangement, because it is necessary that the Senate shall know what they are voting for and how they are voting, before this is voted upon. I desire to be heard, and must be heard on a proposition of that character, which we of the Pacific coast have more knowledge of than others here. I shall not be bound by any agreement if it is to be acted upon now and put upon this bill. I shall desire to be heard upon it before it is voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no power to enforce the agreement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Nevada will set no such example as that by insisting that he will not be bound by an understanding. Everybody knows what that means.

Mr. THURMAN. It has been printed on our tables for months.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator from Massachusetts offers it now, does he not see the effect?

Mr. SUMNER. The proposition has been here four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Nevada can not afford to set this example.

Mr. STEWART. But this is bringing in another bill. I want to submit this proposition to the Senate; here are two distinct bills pending, involving altogether different principles; does an agreement to vote at a certain time upon one bill bind the Senate to take up another bill and put it upon that bill without a chance to say a word? I undertake to say that is not germane, and upon that point I have a right to be heard. The proposition was that we should vote on a bill to regulate naturalization as to persons now entitled to receive it.

Mr. PATTERSON. I should like to ask my friend a question. He says that this in principle is different; will he state how?

Mr. STEWART. I say it is not germane. There are two different propositions. The proposition that we agreed to vote upon was simply a proposition to regulate naturalization among the persons now entitled to naturalization. The proposition introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts is to extend naturalization to a different class involving a different subject, and it is well known here that it will be discussed, and discussed thoroughly. It is a separate bill, one that has been kept separate by the Judiciary Committee, and we are not bound by the agreement when that is sought to be attached——

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote.

Mr. STEWART. Do not put it on this bill.

Mr. WILSON. Let us vote.—Globe, page 5122.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MORTON. One word. This amendment involves the whole Chinese problem. Are you prepared to settle it to-night?

Mr. STEWART. Without discussion.

Mr. MORTON. And without discussion? The country has just awakened to the question and to the enormous magnitude of the question, involving a possible immigration of many millions, involving another civilization, involving labor problems that no intellect can solve without study and without time. Are you now prepared to settle the Chinese problem, thus in advance inviting hat immigration? I am not prepared to do it.—Globe, page 5122.

* * * * * * *

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves an amendment, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That all acts of Congress relating to naturalization be, and the same are hereby, amended by striking out the word 'white' wherever it occurs, so that in naturalization there shall be no distinction of race or color."

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I have to say that that is worth all the rest of the bill put together. That is a section that is pure gold. It will do more for the character, and honor, and good name of this Republic than all the rest of the bill. I am for the rest of the bill, but this is better than all the rest. Now, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART. That is a proposition to extend naturalization, not to those who desire to become citizens, but to those who are being imported as slaves. I propose first to abolish slavery. I propose to liberate these persons before they shall be naturalized by their masters for the purpose of carrying elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I appeal to my friend? I appeal to him to let us vote, because if this amendment is adopted I shall certainly absolve him from any agreement and he may then talk as long as he likes; but, inasmuch as I vote against this amendment solely upon the ground that in honor I can not go for it here when his mouth and the mouths of others are closed, I hope he will let us vote. If we are to have a full debate I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to say that I vote against it for the same reason assigned by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. TIPTON. I wish to say that before this question is ever settled in this country Senators will have to meet the issue whether Christian civilization can be sacrificed or brought in dangerous competition with any system of paganism.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall adhere to our agreement.

Mr. THURMAN. I really do not understand the course that has been pursued. ["Order!"] I rise to a question about our understanding. We agreed to take the vote at a certain hour; we agreed to that unanimously. If this amendment is within the scope of that agreement, then there should be no debate upon it. Some Senators do not think it is within the scope of the agreement. I do not know whether it was in the minds of Senators when the agreement was made; but I think it is an amendment perfectly germane to the bill, and of which the Senator from Massachusetts had given us the amplest notice, months of notice, years of notice, and I therefore think, that being the case, the agreement ought to be applied to it, unless it be that Senators are taken by surprise. I hope, therefore, we shall vote on this question, and I hope my friends will have learned what the Declaration of Independence means by this time. That is all that is necessary.—Globe, page 5124.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CONKLING. Now let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FOWLER. As I stated before, I was paired with the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Abbott) on amendments then existing; but this amendment was not then proposed. I am not paired with him, therefore, on this amendment. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Conkling, Fenton, Fowler, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, Lewis, McDonald, MORRILL of Vermont, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pratt, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, and Trumbull—27.

Nays—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Casserly, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, EDMUNDS, Harlan, Howell, Johnston, McCreery, Morton, STEWART, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Vickers, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—22.

Absent—Messrs. Abbott, Ames, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Ferry, Flanagan, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Revels, Saulsbury, SHERMAN, Spencer, and Yates—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. Now, I think it is clear that I am absolved from any agreement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why so?

Mr. STEWART. Why so? I never have made any such agreement. I never have made an agreement to extend naturalization to the Chinese or a bill to regulate naturalization. I say it is a violation of the agreement to take up another bill, a plain, palpable, clear violation of the agreement. I appeal to every fair man if I am not entitled to discuss this question upon this bill now; and before I proceed I want a vote of the Senate whether I am to proceed to explain what the Senate is about to do. I ask leave to be heard.—Globe, page 5124.

It will be seen by the foregoing that Mr. Thurman was aiding to accomplish a purpose indirectly which he would not do directly. I should not have alluded to this if the Senator from Alabama had not read a speech of Mr. Thurman against the Chinese. I claim that while he voted and spoke against the Chinese, his combination with Sumner and others to choke off debate on Sumner's amendment and secure the naturalization of Chinese deprives him of the right to claim that he was in good faith opposed to the naturalization of the Chinese. If his pretensions had been sincere he would have worked, as well as voted, to save this country from the Chinese curse. No temporary political advantage which he sought to secure by forcing the Republican party to adopt Sumner's amendment without a hearing from Pacific coast Senators would have induced him, if he had been honestly opposed to Chinese suffrage, to join in a scheme to stifle debate.

I finally agreed to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], as shown by the foregoing quotations from the Globe, to allow a vote to be taken, for the purpose of ascertaining if the Senate, under the circumstances, were so strongly convinced that Sumner's amendment was right as to put it on the House bill. Many Senators voted against it because they thought it was not within the agreement, but it turned out, as was evident before the vote was taken that it would, that a large majority of the Senate, as then advised, was in favor of Sumner's amendment. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. Conkling, both contended that I was absolved from the agreement, after this vote was taken, to keep silent and allow Sumner's amendment to become a law.

The debate then proceeded. The distinguished Senators from Vermont, New York, and Indiana [Messrs. EDMUNDS, Conkling, and Morton], repudiated the claim of Sumner, Trumbull, and Thurman that the Senate had made any agreement to settle the Chinese question without debate. An exhaustive discussion then followed on a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, in which Senators SHERMAN, Sumner, Trumbull, Williams of Oregon, Schurz, Morton, myself, and many others participated, running until the Fourth of July and lasting until near midnight of that day, when the motion to reconsider was carried by a vote of 27 to 14.

The yeas and nays were as follows:

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Drake, EDMUNDS, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harlan, McCreery, Morton, Nye, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Scott, STEWART, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Vickers, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Brownlow, Fenton, Harris, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Pomeroy, Revels, Robertson, Ross, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, and Trumbull—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Ames, Anthony, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Casserly, Cattell, Cole, Ferry, Flanagan, Fowler, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Howard, Howe, Howell, Johnston, Lewis, MORRILL of Vermont, Norton, Osborn, Patterson, Pool, Pratt, Rice, Sawyer, Schurz, SHERMAN, Thayer, and Yates—31.—Globe, page 5173.

There were 20 Republicans and 7 Democrats in the 27 votes above given against Chinese naturalization. Among the 14 in favor of naturalization there were no Democrats in regular standing, but Sumner, Trumbull, Ross, and Sprague had practically left the Republican party at that time and never acted with it afterwards. Among the Democrats who were present on the first division and voted against the Sumner amendment, and who deserted before the last vote and were absent on that occasion, leaving the Republican Senators from the Pacific coast to fight the battle alone, was Mr. Casserly, a Democratic Senator from California.

After the defeat of Sumner's amendment, the following amendment was adopted:

The naturalization laws are hereby extended to aliens of African nativity and persons of African descent.

On the passage of the bill every Democrat present except their allies, the Mugwumps of that day, voted in the negative, because they were opposed to extending naturalization to the colored race.

The debate on the motion to reconsider the vote by which Sumner's amendment was adopted was earnest, serious, and exhaustive. The speeches of Senator Williams, of Oregon, on that occasion are models of both eloquence and logic. Mr. Schurz sustained Mr. Sumner in favor of Chinese naturalization in an argument that must be classed among his best efforts, but it was based on the false supposition that the Chinese were the equals of the whites and that their coming was a blessing rather than a curse. I participated in the general debate, showing as best I could the utter ruin which would result to the Pacific coast by the importation of hordes of Chinese to be naturalized to control the political destinies of the West. I called attention to the fact that it was not the Pacific coast alone that was to be invaded by the importation of Chinese coolies, and showed that both the South and the East were to be invaded. A convention was then in session in Charleston, S. C., considering the question of supplanting colored laborers by Chinese coolies. In answer to a question as to how the business was conducted I said:

I will tell you in a moment. This business is done in China by native agents. They trade in their fellow-men. They make these contracts and take as security the family of the cooly, to be sold into slavery if he breaks his contract. They bring him to the coast, and then they enter into contract with Chinese companies organized for that purpose in San Francisco, being six in number. Mr. Koopmanschap, a Dutchman, is one of the principal agents of these Chinese companies in manipulating contracts. He is the man who goes to your conventions in the East and proposes to supplant free labor in the South, to reorganize labor in the South by bringing coolies there. That is the proposition of Mr. Koopmanschap, which he has discussed before Southern conventions; that is the proposition which is being discussed in South Carolina now, and the proposition which is being discussed in Massachusetts. It is proposed to take Chinese coolies there to supply the place of free labor. Sir, this is a proposition to introduce slave labor to compete with free labor.

* * * * * * *

Again I said:

I want to be heard in the name of the Republican party not only of Nevada but of this nation. It is claimed that the Republican party have done certain things whereby they must logically do certain other things in order to be consistent. Now, I propose to show that the Republican party has never done anything to commit itself to the policy which is here proposed; and in order to ascertain that fact it is important to know what policy is proposed.

The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Sumner, is nothing more nor less than this: to extend naturalization to Chinese coolies, brought here under cooly contracts, by which they can be controlled by Chinese companies located in the city of San Francisco. They can not only be controlled in their labor, but controlled in their applications to be naturalized, and they will be equally controlled in their votes.

They are pagans in religion, monarchists in theory and practice, and believe in their form of government, and no other, and look with utter contempt upon all modern forms as dangerous innovations; who believe in their monarchical form of government as they believe in their religion; who will sacrifice life for it; who will commit suicide for their devotion to their government and their religion. The edict from China or from these Chinese companies will be as perfect a control of these men as could be possibly had. It will be absolute and unqualified. It is proposed to extend to them the elective franchise, which follows citizenship under your fifteenth amendment. There are probably about one hundred thousand Chinese, nearly all males, upon the Pacific coast. It will be very easy under these cooly contracts to bring in hundreds of thousands more if you do not check this cooly trade; it will be very easy for them to have all these men under their control, and they will be able to sway, if the American people submit to it, the political destiny of the Pacific coast. I am no alarmist, but I propose to review this question calmly.

We reviewed the position calmly and the question was discussed as thoroughly as any question ever was, and it was decided by the Republican party. That was the party that stood by to prevent the naturalization of Chinese. New England came to the rescue. Every Northern State and the whole Republican party, with a few exceptions, when this thing was explained—that these Chinese were a lower race and that they would be dangerous to our civilization—decided in 1870 that they should not be naturalized. Then what followed? Mr. Sargent in the House and the Senate and others offered several bills, some of which became laws, for the purpose of preventing the importation of coolies. I did the same thing. The bills were to prohibit the importation of coolies under these Chinese contracts. This was before any alarm was raised on the part of the people, before any political issue was formed upon it; but the Republicans in California, Oregon, and Nevada were opposed to this new slave traffic and labored to defeat it.

The Burlingame treaty had been made. The Republican party of this country did not wish to violate that treaty, nor did the Democratic party. After the coming of Chinese was shown to be an unmixed and intolerable evil, bills were introduced by Republicans from the Pacific coast in both Houses to restrict Chinese immigration.

The Republican party was reluctant to legislate in violation of the treaty. They did pass a law, however, for the purpose of restricting Chinese immigration, which President Hayes vetoed on the ground that it was in violation of treaty obligations, and that a new treaty was the proper remedy.

The Republican party then undertook to meet the evil in a legitimate, straightforward manner.

They made a treaty in 1880 which was supposed to be ample to prevent further Chinese immigration. They again passed a bill to prohibit Chinese immigration in 1882, in pursuance of this treaty, which was vetoed by President Arthur for the reason that it violated the treaty. Another bill was immediately passed, which met the President's objections and became a law. The Chinese, however, evaded the law by various devices and were coming in more rapidly than before, literally invading the Pacific coast, and they continue to evade our laws up to this date. In 1884 the Chinese restriction act was amended in many important particulars by a bill introduced in the House by Mr. Henley, a Democratic Representative from California, and became a law largely through the exertions of Mr. MORROW, and other Republicans from the Pacific coast in the House, and Senators Miller and Jones, of Nevada, in the Senate. The bill still did not prevent the fraudulent entry of Chinese. They reduced perjury to a fine art, and either smuggled or swore themselves in by the thousands.

Mr. MORROW introduced another bill in the House in 1866, which was most stringent in its provisions, and calculated to meet and thwart the various tricks of the Chinese and their accomplices. A copy of this bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Fair, a Democratic Senator from Nevada, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which at that time consisted of SHERMAN, of Ohio, EDMUNDS, of Vermont, FRYE, of Maine, EVARTS, of New York, Harrison, of Indiana, MORGAN, of Alabama, BROWN, of Georgia, SAULSBURY, of Delaware, and PAYNE, of Ohio.

This bill was entirely satisfactory to the Pacific coast, and was unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. At the time the bill was called up for consideration, on May 26, 1886, Mr. SHERMAN, who reported and had charge of the bill, said:

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I had better say to the Senate just a few words at this time.

"The bill was intended to carry into execution the existing laws in regard to Chinese immigration. It does not in the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Relations—who are, I believe, unanimous on the subject—change in any material or essential particular the treaty or the laws which have heretofore been enacted; but in the administration of the law several questions of difficulty—legal questions—have arisen, which have been brought before the United States courts.

The bill is mainly the work, as I am advised by the Senator who introduced it [Mr. Fair] of the three United States judges on the Pacific coast whose duty it has been to administer the law.

The provisions are mainly declaratory, or "rather defining the meaning of the provisions of existing law, not with a view to change the principle of the law."

The bill has been very carefully examined in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and so far as I know, every provision was assented to with entire unanimity.—Congressional Record, volume 17, part 5, first session Forty-ninth Congress, page 4958.

General Harrison, as is well known, was a member of the committee and was in favor of the bill, and the Senate adopted it unanimously. The details of that bill I need not give. The people of the Pacific coast understood it and were unanimously in favor of it, as the best thing and the only thing that could be done under the circumstances. General Harrison, who was present, made no speech, but his friendly attitude to the bill is shown by the following in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. INGALLS. I did not know until this moment that the first amendment on page 2 had been agreed to. I understood the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMillan] to ask that the amendment might be again reported.

Mr. HARRISON. He withdrew that request.—Record, volume 17, part 5, page 4961.

This is a slight matter, but it establishes the fact that General Harrison was present and made a suggestion favorable to the bill immediately before its passage. The bill was referred in the House to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and never reported. It is understood that it was regarded by that committee as being in conflict with the treaty of 1880, for immediately thereafter the administration opened negotiations with the Chinese Government for a new treaty, following the precedent set by the preceding Republican administration to proceed by treaty for the exclusion of Chinese. It is believed, however, that if the Senate bill of 1886 had passed the House and become a law there would have been no necessity for any new treaty.

At the present session of Congress the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the 29th of February last, a majority of the committee being Republicans, unanimously reported to the Senate, through Mr. SHERMAN, their chairman, the following bill:

A bill supplementary to and amendatory of "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, as amended by an act to amend said act, approved July 15, 1884.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "Chinese laborer" and "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean any laborer of the Chinese race, without regard to the Government to which such laborer may owe allegiance, and without regard to the port, place, or country from which such laborer may come to the United States; and the words "Chinese passenger," wherever used in this act, or in the acts to which this act is supplementary or amendatory, shall be held to include and mean all persons of the Chinese race without regard to the Government to which they may owe allegiance, or the port, place, or country from which they may come to the United States.

SEC. 2. That all Chinese laborers who departed from the United States between the 17th day of November, 1880, and the 6th day of June, 1882, having at the time of such departure a right to return to the United States under and by virtue of the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the Empire of China, bearing date November 17, 1880, shall avail themselves of such right so secured and return to the United States within six months after the passage of this act; and that every Chinese laborer so departing, who fails to return to the United States within said six months, shall be taken and deemed to have waived his said right to return under the provisions of said treaty, and shall forever thereafter be excluded from the United States.

SEC. 3. That the certificates provided by the act of May 2, 1882, entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," and amendments thereto, to be delivered to Chinese departing from the United States for the purpose of identification on their return, shall, ninety days after the passage of this act, be such as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations to prevent the entry into the United States of any Chinese who are denied the right so to enter by any act of Congress. And the acts of Congress relating to the entry of Chinese into the United States are hereby amended so as to conform with this act.

Before the bill could be acted upon in the Senate, and on March 16, 1888, a new treaty was negotiated and laid before the Senate. The following are the first and second articles of that treaty:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited; and this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding certificates under existing laws or not.

ARTICLE II.

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000 or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Nevertheless, every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States, deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts, as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited. And such right of return to the United States shall be exercised within one year from the date of leaving the United States; but such right of return to the United States may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed one year, in cases where, by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, such Chinese laborer shall be rendered unable sooner to return—which facts shall be fully reported to the Chinese consul at the port of departure, and by him certified, to the satisfaction of the collector of the port at which such Chinese subject shall land in the United States. And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

The original articles of the treaty are shown by the portions of the above quotation in Roman; the portions in italics are the amendments made by the Senate. Without those amendments it was feared by the Senate that the same trouble would exist that we now have in regard to the coming of Chinese on account of previous residence and their entry without certificates on proof of loss of the originals. The Senate was unwilling to trust Chinese testimony on these questions, and accordingly made the amendments, which greatly improve the treaty.

The bill now under consideration is to carry into effect the treaty as amended, if the Chinese Government consents to these amendments, and if it does not I have no doubt that Congress will pass a bill similar to this—treaty or no treaty. Fortunately for the country, both parties are agreed that the Chinese should be excluded. There is no difference of opinion on the subject, and a discussion of the attitude of Senators before they were fully informed upon the subject will not advance the public interest. But since an attempt has been made to disparage the Republican party in connection with this subject, an examination of the record will vindicate that party and place it in an honorable and consistent attitude. The allusions to the position of General Harrison render it proper that his whole record in regard to the Chinese question should be known.

It is true that General Harrison was opposed to the bill in 1882, which was subsequently vetoed by President Arthur on account of its conflict with the treaty of 1880, and he consistently voted against the twenty-years clause, upon which President Arthur's veto was mainly predicated. It is also true that he voted for the following amendments, offered by Senator HOAR:

Provided, That this bill shall not apply to any skilled laborer who shall establish that he comes to this country without any contract by which his labor is the property of any person other than himself.

Provided further, That any laborer who shall receive a certificate from the United States consul at the port where he shall embark that he is an artisan, coming to this country at his own expense and of his own free will, and has established such fact to the satisfaction of such consul, shall not be affected by this bill.—Congressional Record, volume 13, part 2, first session Forty-seventh Congress, pages 1716 and 1717.

General Harrison at that time, in common with most of the Eastern people who had not visited the Pacific coast, was ignorant of the character of the Chinese and their tricks and devices to evade our laws, and it seemed to him unreasonable to exclude free and independent skilled laborers who came to this country of their own accord, and not under cooly contracts or contracts for labor. He would certainly have voted otherwise if he had been better informed, as his subsequent record abundantly proves.

It is also true he voted against the Farley amendment, which is in the following words:

That hereafter no State court, or court of the United States, shall admit Chinese to citizenship; and all laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.—Record, part 2, pages 1481; 1749.

His vote against this amendment was certainly correct. There was no law, and there never has been any, allowing Chinese to be naturalized; on the contrary, the right of naturalization was denied to Chinese, as I have already shown, by the Conness amendment to the Burlingame treaty; and by the act of July, 1870, the discussion of which I have already reviewed, the right of naturalization was confined to white men and Africans. Asiatics were excluded. Farley's amendment proposing to repeal all laws granting the right of naturalization to Chinese was absurd when no such law existed, and ought to have been rejected. Senator EDMUNDS offered the proper amendment on that subject, for which General Harrison voted, in the following language:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to change the existing naturalization laws so as to admit Chinese persons to citizenship.—Record, part 4, page 3411.

Grover's amendment against which Senator Harrison voted is in the following language:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled laborers, and Chinese employed in mining.—Record, part 2, pages 1480; 1750.

Senator Harrison objected to this definition because it varied the language used in the treaty, the object of the legislation being to carry the treaty into effect without changing its meaning, and because he preferred the amendment offered by Senator EDMUNDS, for which he voted, in the following language:

The words "Chinese laborers," wherever used in this act, shall be construed to mean persons usually engaged in manual labor.—Record, part 4, page 3411.

It seems to me that any person seeking to carry into effect the terms of the treaty would have preferred the Edmunds amendment, and that General Harrison voted correctly.

Senator Harrison was absent on official business at the Soldiers' Home when the bill passed, but if present would undoubtedly have voted against it on account of the twenty-years clause, for he voted against passing the bill over the President's veto on that ground, and Senator Maxey stated he regarded himself as paired on the bill with Senator Harrison. Immediately after the failure to pass the bill over the veto, the bill which had been introduced by Mr. Page, of California, in the House, prohibiting Chinese immigration for the period of ten years instead of twenty, came to the Senate for action. The Farley and Grover amendments above quoted were adopted by the Senate on the House bill, and the amendments of Mr. EDMUNDS, also above quoted, were rejected, and for that reason Senator Harrison voted against the bill.

On the passage of the act of 1884 Mr. Harrison was absent and had no opportunity to participate in the legislation. Not one word was uttered by him in either 1882 or 1884 indicating that he was not thoroughly in favor of Chinese exclusion. He was a new member, had never been to California, knew nothing personally of the Chinese evil, but was endeavoring to legislate in conformity with existing treaties and followed the lead of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in the construction of the treaty. After the act of 1884 had proved defective and was continually evaded by the Chinese, both Senators EDMUNDS and Harrison favored more radical legislation and supported the Morrow-Fair bill, to which I have already alluded. This bill was more radical than the Democratic House of Representatives was willing to pass, as I have already shown, and consequently the Administration proceeded to the negotiation of the pending treaty. There can be no doubt of the views of Senator Harrison in 1886, when the Morrow-Fair bill was passed, nor in February, 1888, when he wrote the following letter to a friend:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., February 29, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: Your kind letter of February 28 has been received. I am very much obliged to you for the kind interest which you take in my behalf. You knew me well enough while here to know that I am no schemer for place, and I have not fallen from grace in that respect since you left here.

I did vote with the great body of Republicans in the Senate against the Chinese restriction bill, as it was called. It seemed to me then to be in violation of our treaty with China, and it was a little hard for me to let go of the old idea that this was the free home of all comers. I think there has been a very general change of sentiment on that subject since. We do not need to ask anybody to come to this country now, as we formerly did, and I think we have a right to preserve our own institutions by exercising a fair election as to who shall come here. I do not like that class of immigration that comes in gangs, that can be driven into pens and on shipboard, and hired, not by personal contract, but by bosses, and the Chinese immigration is very much of this sort.

Very truly, yours,

BENJ. HARRISON.

Rev. J. S. BRANT, St. Louis, Mo.

The attempt to make it appear that General Harrison is not, and was not before his nomination, thoroughly in favor of the absolute exclusion of Chinese is absurd, and shows to what extremes partisan prejudice may be carried in a political contest.

The quotations made in the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] from speeches made by Republican Senators—HOAR, DAWES, SHERMAN, INGALLS, HAWLEY, and perhaps others—in opposition to what seemed to them to be class legislation against the Chinese, were ill-timed. These Senators had been for years engaged in a grand struggle for the vindication of human rights and equality before the law. They were veterans in the great work that liberated more than 4,000,000 of slaves and removed the disgrace of human slavery from the Republic. They had also been engaged during the prime of their manhood in securing for the oppressed freedmen the rights of American citizens; they had been leaders in the cause of the Union and the restoration of the Southern States to their normal relations to this Government; they had been taught to believe that all men within the jurisdiction of the United States were equal before the law and entitled to the protection of the law.

They had not learned the peculiarities of the Asiatic strangers who were invading the Western coast. They had not observed the insidious power by which the Chinese undermine, destroy, and subvert Christian civilization; that where they come our race can not stay; that they are wholly and absolutely antagonistic to our race, and that they are imported as coolies and slaves, and move in gangs with which white labor can not compete and in the presence of which white laborers must starve. In ignorance of this condition of things it is creditable to the distinguished Republican Senators whose speeches were quoted by the Senator from Alabama that they were unwilling to join in what to them seemed an unnecessary and cruel opposition to a weak, unwarlike, and peaceable race until they had time and opportunity to understand the conditions and the necessities of excluding the Asiatic hordes from our borders.

No fair-minded man from the Pacific coast will complain of the people of the East because they did not earlier discover the unmitigated evil of Chinese immigration. It was unreasonable that it should be known in the East as soon as it was in the West. If it took California twenty years to discover that the presence of Chinese was dangerous, it was unreasonable to expect that the people of the East should know this fact in advance. The opposition of the Democratic party to the Chinese was natural. They were in favor of the negro as a slave, but were against him as a man. They viewed the Chinese from the same standpoint that they did the colored man. Neither had any political or civil rights which they respected, and while they did not trouble themselves much to secure affirmative legislation to exclude Chinese, they readily voted for any proposition which curtailed the rights of any person of color, either black or yellow.

Now, what is there in all this to make party capital out of? The people of the East did not originally understand this question. It was a long time before the people of the West—before the people of even the Pacific coast understood it. They did not understand it at the time the Burlingame treaty was made. They did not understand it at the time that Governor Haight and Judge Hager and other leading men were at the Burlingame banquet in San Francisco receiving the Chinese embassy with open arms, and congratulating them on the consummation of this "great work," as they then termed it. I say they did not then appreciate it, because the Chinese had generally followed vocations by themselves. They mined where other people did not wish to mine. But when they commenced taking the place of white men, and were hired out by the Chinese Six Companies in gangs, and began taking the bread out of the mouths of white men, then all parties on the Pacific coast became a unit against Chinese naturalization and citizenship.

Mr. RANSOM. Will the Senator let me call his attention to a matter of record?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. RANSOM. After hearing the Senator from Nevada, and not being familiar with the history of the matter, I presumed that Judge Thurman and Senator Trumbull were together on this question. I find, Mr. President, that on the vote alluded to by the Senator from Nevada, in which 27 Senators voted one way and 14 the other, the Senator from Nevada and Judge Thurman voted together.

Mr. STEWART. Exactly.

Mr. RANSOM. And Judge Trumbull voted the other way.

Mr. STEWART. Exactly.

Mr. RANSOM. And I believe that for four or five other succeeding votes on this subject Judge Thurman and the Senator from Nevada voted together on every vote.

Mr. STEWART. We voted together, and I so stated.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. STEWART. I so stated.

Mr. RANSOM. I thought the Senator left the inference that Judge Thurman favored the Sumner amendment. I simply desired to show that he voted against it.

Mr. STEWART. He did vote against it, but he undertook to help Trumbull to choke me off, so that I could not tell the story, and if the story could not have been told the amendment would have been adopted.

Mr. RANSOM. There is the Globe showing that Mr. Thurman voted with the Senator from Nevada every time upon that question, and in the very vote that he called attention to, in order to show that the vote was the other way, it now appears that Judge Thurman voted with him, and it further appears, so far as I can recall, that not a Democrat voted against the proposition—not one, and of fourteen negative votes not one was that o la Democrat.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken when he says that I stated that Judge Thurman voted for Sumner's amendment. I stated directly the opposite. Not one Senator then styling himself a Democrat voted against it, nor would the Democrats extend naturalization to anybody except whites. They were opposed to extending naturalization to any but white persons; that is true; and notwithstanding Judge Thurman was opposed to it, and notwithstanding I had explained to him in the Judiciary Committee the evils involved in Sumner's amendment, and notwithstanding the committee had decided to keep these two propositions separate, and had so reported, he undertook to force a vote upon them jointly, and contended that the Sumner amendment was germane and legitimate on the House bill, and that I was honorably bound to keep my mouth closed and allow this great wrong to be perpetrated. He knew the effect of choking me off perfectly well, and I felt outraged at the position he took in opposition to the action of the committee in separating the two propositions and against the views of the distinguished Senators from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and New York [Mr. Conkling].

At the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont the vote was taken, and the amendment of Sumner adopted by a vote of 27 to 22, as I have already shown. Many Senators voted against it because they thought it was not within the agreement and that it was wrong to shut off debate in the manner proposed. The Senator from Vermont himself remarked that he voted against the amendment solely on the ground that it was not right to cut off debate, but that he was in favor of the amendment when it might be fairly considered. After it was fairly considered and full debate allowed he became convinced that the amendment was wrong and voted against it on the final vote, and has ever since been opposed to the naturalization of Chinese. The minds of many other Senators were changed by the debate, as the final vote of 27 against and only 14 for the amendment shows.

While it is true that no person then styling himself a Democrat voted for the amendment, several Senators who never afterwards acted with the Republican party, but joined the Democratic-Greeley party at the following election, voted for the Sumner amendment extending naturalization to the Chinese. Among these were Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts; Mr. Sprague, of Rhode Island; Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, and Mr. Ross, of Kansas, now Democratic governor of New Mexico. The 10 Republicans voting for the amendment who remained with the Republican party were Brownlow, of Tennessee; Fenton, of New York; Harris and Kellogg, of Louisiana; McDonald, of Arkansas; Morrill, of Maine; Pomeroy, of Kansas; Revels, of Mississippi; Robertson, of South Carolina, and Spencer, of Alabama. Seven of these Senators represented Southern States and were elected by colored constituencies. It was necessary for them to be extreme.

Only 4 Northern Republican Senators voted to extend naturalization to the Chinese, and afterwards remained in the Republican party, while 20 Republicans representing Northern States voted against the amendment, all of whom remained with the party. The fact that Trumbull, Summer, and others were about to turn their backs on the Republican party and lend their influence to place the Democrats in power may throw some light upon the conduct of Senator Thurman in attempting to aid them to embarrass the Republican party by making them adopt the amendment, which he well knew would be destruction to the Republican party on the Pacific coast. Mr. Trumbull possibly had the same design. He was opposed to negro suffrage and fought the fifteenth amendment more vigorously than any Democrat. His newborn zeal for extending naturaliztion to Chinese and Africans may have been inspired by his desire to aid the Democratic party, which he had at that time practically joined. I do not pretend to say that there was any secret understanding between Senators Thurman and Trumbull to injure the Republican party on the Pacific coast, but I do say that they joined in an effort to stifle debate and bring a terrible calamity upon the country.

In the long debate of July 2 and July 4, and the night of the 4th, no Democrat made an argument against naturalizing Chinese. They confined themselves to jokes, interruptions, and points of order, as the Globe will show. Mr. Casserly, the Democratic Senator from California, was present on the first day and made a few remarks on the point of order, but took no further interest in the proceedings. What Republican would have left the Senate Chamber under such circumstances who had an interest in the question and was in earnest about it?

Mr. Williams and Mr. Corbett, of Oregon, fought bravely against the amendment, and the Globe shows it. So did Senator Morton and others, saying this was a great question; it was too great an experiment to open our gates to be overrun by the millions of Asiatics who would flock to our shores.

Mr. RANSOM. The whole contest on that question was made by Republicans, and by nobody but Republicans. I care nothing about it, but Mr. Sumner raised the question, and he was supported by Republicans, and not supported by a Democrat, as the Globe shows.

Mr. STEWART. It is true no Democrat voted for the measure, but Mr. Sumner's support on the vital question of whether or not the Senate should be informed before it voted, came from Senators Thurman, Trumbull, and others, who were preparing to defeat the Republican party through the Greeley combination. The Democrats who were then known and called Democrats were opposed to any extension of the right of naturalization to persons who were not white. They were as much opposed to the naturalization of Africans as the Chinese.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me for reading from the Globe the proof of what he says.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the bill had been put in a condition so as to exclude the Chinese from naturalization and to include all the people of other countries than China, and the question was on its passage, I believe every Democrat in the Senate voted against its passage, there being eight of them who voted, none of them voting for it that I can see; and all the Republicans who were present voted for it, and among the nays—the list is very short—are Messers. Bayard, Boreman, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Saulsbury, Stockton, Thurman, and Vickers; and all the yeas were Republicans.

So the case is exactly as stated by the Senator from Nevada, that at that time the Democratic party apparently in the Senate were not opposed to Chinese naturalization as a separate and distinct question from other naturalization, but they were opposed to the naturalization of anybody except people from Europe, and were opposed to the naturalization of the colored man whether he was in this country or not in this country, and, therefore, when the bill was put in a condition to include the African, the man of African descent, and to cover nothing else on that point, every Democrat in the Senate voted against it, as the Senator says, and would do it again.

Mr. RANSOM. In reply to the Senator from Vermont I would say that if he will look over the Globe and have it read as he read it, he will see upon the Chinese question every Democrat who voted voted invariably against them and not one Democrat voted for Mr. Sumner's proposition. On the four or five different votes there they are recorded in that way.

Mr. STEWART. But what I complain of is that Mr. Thurman joined Trumbull, Sumner, and others against the decision of the committee in separating the two measures, against the views of the distinguished Senators from Vermont and New York, members of the Judiciary Committee, as expressed in the debate, in an attempt by stifling debate to force upon the country the Chinese curse in its most destructive form.

I had a right to complain of the conduct of Senator Thurman and his Democratic colleagues on that occasion. The debate shows the sneers and jokes of Democratic Senators in their attempt to embarrass Senators from the Pacific coast and prevent a fair and impartial hearing. It was the Republican party that we were called upon to convince that this was wrong. We did convince them; and when the time came that the Chinese were invading the Pacific coast and interfering with civilization there, it was the Republican party that moved to abrogate the Burlingame treaty and make a treaty restricting Chinese immigration, and the Republican party, and not the Democratic party, did make the treaty of 1880 for that purpose. Nearly every measure that has been before Congress has been introduced by Republicans, and every measure to restrict Chinese immigration in any form which has become a law has been passed mainly through the influence of Republicans. True, they have been sustained by Democratic votes as well, but the facts and arguments upon which they were based were produced and made mainly by Republicans. Republicans have done this work.

The bill of 1886, to which I have already alluded, and which was unanimously passed by a Republican Senate, was satisfactory to everybody, and if it could have become a law, if the Democratic House had passed it, there would have been no necessity for the bill under consideration and no necessity for this treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will permit me to say that we would be in a better position than with this treaty and this law.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, in a better position if we had that law. But I am not disposed to criminate any one on account of the past. All parties are now agreed. We understand the question and the great American people are of one accord and agree that we can not afford to invite Chinese immigration or to tolerate their coming, and that being the decree that has gone forth, I am satisfied with it. I do not propose to go back and look up the record at a time when some man did not understand the question and spoke in behalf of humanity, not knowing the situation, who spoke of applying the same principles to the Chinese that he applied to other men without knowing the distinction and not knowing the evil they would bring upon the country. I am not disposed to criticise them, and I think the Senators on the other side will bear me witness that I never have in this Chamber, and I never intend to, allude to the past political position of any Senator on account of any errors he may have made. If he is right to-day, I will accept him.

The assertion that the Republican party is responsible for the Chinese being here and that the Democratic party has always opposed the Chinese is not true. The attempt to make this a political issue and charge the Republicans with it is monstrous in view of the facts. The Republican party has made every move to prevent the country being flooded with Chinese. They raised the alarm. They have gone further, day and night, in season and out of season, from the very first, to prevent the coming of Chinese. They commenced, before any Democrat thought of it, to amend the treaty to prevent naturalization. When the proposition to naturalize Chinese was before the Senate the Republicans alone made a showing against it, and it was defeated by Republican votes. When Chinese immigration became oppressive it was the Republican party that moved in the matter.

I admit that the Democratic party in pursuance of its traditions has voted against the Chinese. They did so for political purposes. But I do deny that they have ever been earnest workers in this great contest which has been waged by the Pacific coast for the purpose of preserving free institutions and American civilization in that country. I deny that they have. I deny that they have been the moving spirits in any contest on this floor or in the other House in favor of rescuing that country from the inundations of the Chinese. It is not true. Since the Republican party has decreed that the Chinese shall not come, the world knows that their coming will be stopped. They are earnest and they will prevent it.

I regret that any Senator here should attempt to manufacture party capital out of this question. I would never have alluded in this discussion to what either party had done. I am not in the habit of doing that. I spoke on the Chinese question early in the session and congratulated the country that there was unanimity of sentiment now, but made no allusion to party politics. I never alluded to what one party or the other did; but to have a labored speech made here showing that the Republican party is responsible for this evil that it has labored so zealously to prevent can not go unrebuked by me.

I regret that I have been on the present occasion under the necessity of alluding to the action of Judge Thurman; but when he is held up as an earnest opponent of the Chinese evil and leading Republicans are denounced, I felt it my duty to call attention to his position when the principal question regarding the Chinese was settled in the Senate and naturalization denied to millions of Asiatics by Republican votes, secured by Republican arguments, against the Trumbull-Thurman scheme to stifle debate and accomplish indirectly what the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Thurman, would not do directly, and which he freely denounces on all public occasions as wicked and outrageous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is——

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have a vote. We are all for the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think that we ought to pass a bill here at almost quarter after 6 o'clock with only about ten Senators on the floor. There is no quorum here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Missouri is right. On looking around I think there is no quorum here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. I hope the unfinished business will be laid before the Senate before the motion to adjourn is put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 8, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 7, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VETO MESSAGE—P. A. LEATHERBURY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 3008, entitled "An act for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury."

This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the person above named the sum of $601.27, being the amount paid by him to Lucy Roberts on two pension checks which were afterward recalled and canceled.

The committee of the House to whom this bill was referred report "that the Department discovered, after the issuing of the checks, that the claim for pension was fraudulent, but not until after the purchase, in the ordinary course of business, by Mr. Leatherbury, paying $601.27 therefor, and giving his due-bill for the balance, which balance he refused to pay after ascertaining that the check was repudiated by the Government."

Lucy Roberts, a colored woman, filed a claim for pension in 1868, alleging that she was the widow of Nelson Roberts, who died in the military service in 1865.

Her claim was allowed in 1876, and two checks, numbered 6863 and 6864, aggregating $1,301.27, were issued on account of said pension. Before payment of the checks information was received which caused an investigation by the Pension Bureau as to the honesty of the claim for pension. This investigation established its utterly fraudulent character, and thereupon the checks were canceled, and the woman's name was dropped from the pension-rolls.

Certain important facts are reported to me from the Pension Bureau as having been developed upon the investigation.

It appears that one Thomas had undertaken to act for the claimant in procuring her pension under an agreement that he should have $300 if successful. Mr. Leatherbury was a notary, postmaster, and claim agent, and acted as notary and general assistant to Thomas and the claimant, who was employed at Leatherbury's house. In the month of July, 1876, the same month the claim for pension was allowed, the woman Roberts was indicted for larceny, the complaining witness being Mr. Leatherbury. Shortly after the issue of the checks the woman disappeared, and it is reported that certain indications suggested that both Leatherbury and Thomas were not entirely ignorant of her whereabouts, nor completely disconnected with her disappearance. The checks were obtained from Thomas by Leatherbury, he paying, as he alleges, to Thomas the fee of $300, which had been agreed upon.

The checks remained in Leatherbury's possession until they were delivered by him to the special agent of the Pension Bureau upon the investigation. He claimed in his deposition that he considered that what money he had let the woman have and the goods she had obtained at his store while she worked for him, and the $300 which he had advanced to Thomas, her agent, justified him in holding her indebted to him in the sum of $600, and that he held the checks as security for the same, admitting that there was still $700 in her favor, written acknowledgment of which he had placed in the hands of his wife. He further stated that rather than gain notoriety in the matter he would return the checks to the special agent, but he trusted that the Government would pay him the $600 which he had sunk in the transaction.

The woman testified that she did take some goods from Leatherbury at his store at his suggestion, after the arrival of the checks and before she left, about August 16, 1876, which purchases amounted to no more than $100, and that he also advanced her $100; that he made no further payment and wrote to her that he had to give up the checks, and that she never indorsed the checks nor authorized any one to do so.

Both Leatherbury and Thomas disclaimed any knowledge of the fraudulent character of the claim. But the fraudulent claimant lived in the house of one of them and he was assisting in procuring her claim to be allowed, while the other made an unlawful agreement for a liberal compensation for his services if the claim succeeded. The woman was indicted at the instance of Leatherbury at about the time of the issuance of the checks and fled, but if she is to be believed Leatherbury wrote to her during her absence. After her disappearance he ventures to pay to Thomas his illegal fee and takes possession of the checks. He considers that she owes him $600, and the bill under consideration gives him $601.27, the exact amount of the checks less $700.

Some one with more intelligence than this ignorant colored woman concocted the scheme to gain this fraudulent pension; and the circumstances point so suspiciously toward Thomas and Leatherbury, the claim of the latter upon the Government is infected with so much illegality, and the amount of his advances is arrived at so loosely, that in my opinion he should not at this late day be relieved.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 3, 1888.

JURY COMMISSIONERS, NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting a letter from the United States attorney for New Mexico, and submitting an estimate of appropriations for expenses of jury commissioners in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. OATES. What is the bill and what is the amendment?

Mr. WILKINSON. I will state that it does not add one dollar to the amount or change one word in any respect in the bill as it passed the House, except to include an item making the appropriation in the bill itself. When the bill was passed it was passed as such bills ordinarily are passed, with the understanding that the appropriation would be placed by the Appropriation Committee in some of the general appropriation bills.

But in this instance the bill passed the House too late, and the committee could not put it on any of the bills on which appropriations for this purpose are usually placed, as they had already been reported to the House. I ask leave, therefore, to concur in the Senate amendment making the appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment will be read, subject to objection.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. OATES. What is the bill?

Mr. WILKINSON. It is for the purpose of establishing aids to navigation at and near the mouth of the Mississippi River. The Senate amendment, as I have said, does not change the purport of the bill, but it simply makes an appropriation of the amount covered by the bill which could not be placed in time on any of the regular appropriation bills, as is customarily done.

There being no objection the Senate amendment was considered and concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had adopted resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has learned with profound regret of the death of Philip H. Sheridan, late General of the Armies of the United States.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its grateful sense of his great and patriotic services in the cause of the country, and its deep sensibility of the loss the nation has sustained by his death, and its sympathy with his family in their bereavement.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the family of the deceased.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

ANNIE GIBSON YATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7708) with Senate amendments disagreed to by the House, and a resolution of the Senate insisting upon its amendments to said bill.

The SPEAKER. The conferees on this bill have been already appointed on the part of the House.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICE SUPREME COURT, WYOMING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1324) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of Wyoming, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an order of the Senate adopted August 2, appointing Mr. MANDERSON as a conferee in place of Mr. DAVIS on the bill (S. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton with the rank and grade of colonel.

RIGHT OF WAY.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. 11111) granting the right of way to the Pensacola and Memphis Railroad Company over and through the public lands of the United States in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, and granting the right of way to said railroad company over and through the United States naval and military reservations near Pensacola in the State of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRESENT REVENUE LAW AND MILLS BILL.

Mr. McMILLIN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives a comparison of the text of the present law and the Mills bill (H. R. 9051) and tables showing the effect of the proposed legislation upon the revenues; to be prepared under direction of the Committee on Ways and Means.

CONFEREES ON ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 10234) Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. MAISH, and Mr. LAIRD.

OHIO CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3182) and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It has been read quite recently in the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill has already been read?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes; it was read within the last week, and I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the title of the bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3182) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture, the Government Printing Office, and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Ohio centennial to be held at Columbus, Ohio, from September 4 to October 19, 1888.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OATES. I object.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, to permit me to make a brief explanation.

Mr. OATES. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the gentleman from Ohio will make a brief statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The reason, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement is to show the appropriateness of the withdrawal of the objection urged by the gentleman from Alabama.

This bill does not contribute or appropriate a single dollar of money out of the Treasury of the United States to the State of Ohio. The State of Ohio in 1886 resolved to celebrate the centennial of the settlement of the Northwest Territory, and has invited all the States that grew out of that Territory, and has invited the States that may be called the parent States also to participate in this celebration. The time is now drawing near within which the Executive Departments of the Government must take steps to participate if they are to do so. It must take steps by the 4th of September, and unless this bill is considered at this time there will be no opportunity or this will be the last opportunity, probably, that I shall have to bring this measure forward in behalf of the State of Ohio.

What is this exhibition? It is an exhibition of arts and sciences; an exhibition of the industries of the Northwest Territory, and all of that which goes to show the advancement of this country during one hundred years. As I said before, several of the States which grew out of that Northwest Territory have signified their intention to participate in this centennial. The State of Ohio has furnished magnificent grounds, has built large buildings, and has built one building in particular that will accommodate ten thousand people in the auditorium. Then a great number of these States have signified their intention of sending exhibits of their arts, their industries, and their sciences, and associations and societies of all kinds—military and civil, religious and political, educational and labor societies of every kind which can be enumerated have signified their intention to be there. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that there will be at least two million citizens of this country who will visit that centennial.

All this bill asks is that the National Government shall, too, participate in this exhibition. It is not to appropriate a single cent for the State of Ohio, not to give a single penny, but simply that enough money be appropriated to enable the Departments to make a respectable appearance for the National Government. As I said before, the time is short, but three weeks and a few days remaining before the centennial must be opened, if the preparations are to be made in the Departments. During this very session of Congress there has been appropriated without objection $147,000 to permit a city to have an exposition. Now, why can not the great State of Ohio be permitted to have such an exhibition from those things belonging to the National Government which will show the steps of our progress during the past one hundred years?

Mr. O'FERRALL. How much do you ask?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Forty thousand dollars. It seems almost a humiliation that one should be compelled, under the circumstances which surround us, to make an appeal for the State of Ohio to see the National Government represented at a celebration of the character that this will be; and I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to withdraw his objection.

Mr. OATES. My friend from Ohio has exhibited the usual zeal in a case wherein his constituency desire to have the Government participate in an exhibition of this character. The objection which I interposed this morning is not on account of the particular locality where this exhibition is to be held, but it is to the principle. It is no part of the business of the Government of the United States, nor should it be, to engage in the general show business, and wherever it participates in these exhibitions at the expense of the Treasury of the United States, in my judgment it is unwarranted. The Government was not inaugurated for any such purposes. It is an abuse of the power or the exercise of unwarranted power, and while I have objected before, I will not on this occasion, but content myself with voting against the measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. To consider this measure now.

Mr. CANNON. For what length of time?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I want the time to be as brief as possible.

Mr. CANNON. I will not antagonize by objecting; but I ask the gentleman from Ohio to let us have, say, two hours for debate or so much as is necessary for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] think that two hours is an objection, and that the House would hardly be willing that it should be occupied two hours with the consideration of this measure?

Mr. CANNON. If two hours is not necessary we certainly do not need to occupy it. I do not desire to say a great deal about it; but I should like to be heard. His proposition is to the effect that we are to go into this business, and I think we should consider the matter fully, as the time seems to have arrived when a stop should be put to this business and draw the line somewhere.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Let the debate run on. I have no objection to that. The gentleman can have whatever time he desires.

Mr. CANNON. I would suggest two hours. I want a portion of the time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, the gentleman can control one hour, and the other hour be left to my control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question then is as to ordering the bill to be read the third time.

Mr. WISE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any surplus arising from the appropriation made to either of the Departments by the act of May 28, 1888, for participation in the centennial exhibition of the Ohio Valley may be transferred and used for the same purpose to participate equally in the national exhibitions to be held in the cities of Augusta, Ga., and Richmond, Va., during the months of October and November of the present year.

Mr. WISE. I simply want to add in reference to that amendment, that we are not asking for an appropriation any more than the gentleman from Ohio. We are asking that the cities of Richmond and Augusta shall be treated as the cities of Cincinnati, Marietta, and Columbus, Ohio. In May last, as the gentleman from Ohio has stated, $147,000 were appropriated in this way for an exposition at Cincinnati, Ohio, celebrating the centennial of the organization of that Territory into States. I believe that the State of Virginia has as much right to an appropriation by this Congress in aid of the exposition at Richmond as the State of Ohio or any other State in the Union. She is the mother, I may say, of those States. The members of this House need not to be reminded that it is in consequence of the munificence of Virginia that you have that event to celebrate.

We do not ask for an appropriation. We simply ask that what may be left of your appropriation for the expositions at Cincinnati and at Marietta, if anything, may be used for a governmental exhibit at Richmond, Va., and also for an exhibit at Augusta, Ga. I think we are asking but very little, and I trust the House will adopt this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] was to control half the time and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other half. To whom does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to add a few words to what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE]. This proposition to aid an exposition at Richmond, Va., and another at Augusta, Ga., simply provides that if there be any surplus left after paying the expenses of the Government exhibits at Cincinnati and at Marietta, which have already been provided for by an act passed by this Congress, that surplus shall be equally divided between the exposition at Richmond and that at Augusta, Ga. As to the exposition at Augusta I will say that that city has already raised by private subscriptions a larger amount of money for the purposes of the exposition than has hitherto been raised anywhere in the South, and has erected a larger building for that purpose. That money, I say, has been raised by private subscriptions, and we are not asking now for any independent appropriation, but simply that if there be any surplus left after paying for the Government displays at Cincinnati and at Marietta that surplus shall go to the expositions at Augusta and at Richmond, respectively. That is all we ask, and I trust that the gentleman in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he amend the amendment so as to provide that if there be any surplus left in the Treasury of the United States it shall be used for this purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARNES. No, sir; I do not accept that suggestion. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, heretofore the Government of the United States has had exhibits at several expositions and at different places. The first, I believe, was at Philadelphia during the centennial year. The second large one was at New Orleans a year or so ago. I think there was a Government exhibit also at Louisville and perhaps at one or two other places. At this session of Congress we have appropriated in round numbers $150,000 to make an exhibit at Cincinnati. Upon investigation it was ascertained that the exposition to be held at Cincinnati was to be both national and international, and it was thought by both the House and the Senate that, pursuing the policy heretofore pursued, an appropriation should be made for a Government exhibit there, and it was made.

It is not necessary for me to speak of the merits of the exposition at Cincinnati. Gentlemen know all about it. The Government exhibit at Marietta, if it can be called such, was merely an exhibit of some documents from the State Department of special interest on that occasion. There have been several propositions referred to the Committee on Appropriations, asking that appropriations be made for expositions at other points. Among those proposed expositions is one at Augusta, Ga., and another, which was urged with great force, and which, I must say, appealed strongly to me as an individual member of the House, for an appropriation to aid the colored people to make a national exposition at Atlanta to show the progress they have made in this country since they acquired their freedom. That, I say, was urged with great force and was very fully considered by the committee, but it was the sense of a majority of the committee that the appropriation should not be made, and they declined to recommend it to the House.

The same thing is true with reference to the exposition at Augusta, Ga. An appropriation for that purpose was also urged with much force, and undoubtedly the proposition was of considerable merit, but the committee did not recommend it. The same thing is true with reference to the proposed exposition in Virginia. The committee declined to recommend appropriations for either of those three. The same thing is true also with reference to the exposition at Columbus.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. Did the committee recommend the appropriation for the exposition at Cincinnati?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WISE. What is the difference?

Mr. CANNON. I will try to explain to the gentleman the difference. The committee also recommended, years ago, an appropriation for the Philadelphia exposition, and also, later, for the New Orleans exposition, because those were both national and international expositions, like the one at Cincinnati.

Mr. OATES. Were not those appropriations also in the nature of loans, and did not the Government recover the money loaned at Philadelphia?

Mr. CANNON. No, sir.

Mr. OATES. I am informed that it did.

Mr. CANNON. I will tell the gentleman exactly how that was. The Government did make a loan to Philadelphia, not for the purpose of making an exhibit, but for the purpose of assisting in the construction of buildings, etc., for the exposition. Every dollar of that loan has been repaid. In addition to that, however, the Government of the United States through its various Departments made an exhibit there, the expense of which was not repaid and was never intended to be repaid.

The Government loaned a million dollars toward founding the exposition at New Orleans and putting up the building; and it also made there an exhibit by the Government Departments, and afterward I think paid out nearly a million dollars more, of which it never got back a cent, and never will.

Mr. OATES. I wish to inquire of my friend whether he does not think that our experience in these matters, irrespective of any question of power, ought to be sufficient to satisfy members of the impropriety of making an appropriation of this sort.

Mr. CANNON. As I said when I commenced my remarks, the time has come for us to determine on a policy touching the exhibitions in which the Government shall participate at various places throughout the country from one ocean to the other. One reason that the committee failed to recommend the appropriation for the Columbus exposition was that at Cincinnati within three hours' railroad ride—I believe I am correct——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Add two hours, and say five hours.

Mr. CANNON. Well, five hours; whatever it may be. Within the same State and at a city within five hours' ride by railway, the Government has authorized an expenditure of $150,000 for an exposition which is proceeding at the same time as the Columbus exposition. Now, I doubt the correctness of the policy of engaging in making this exhibit at Columbus in the same State with the Cincinnati exposition, and going on at the same time.

Let me mention another reason why the committee failed to recommend this appropriation. If you go over to the National Museum in this city you will find the collections there are very greatly impaired; that whenever you send these collections from the National Museum they are very greatly damaged. A person in charge of that museum stated before our committee that the wear was accelerated at least six-fold by shipping these collections back and forth in connection with these expositions, and that it had already taken many years to repair the damages thus done to valuable collections and would take many more years to finish such repairs.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. I asked the gentleman a moment ago why an appropriation for the exposition at Cincinnati had been recommended and an appropriation refused for the exposition at Columbus. His answer certainly was not satisfactory to my judgment. I wish now to ask him whether the committee, at the time they recommended the appropriation for the exposition at Cincinnati, was not aware that the State of Ohio, by the action of her Legislature, had recommended that an appropriation be made for the exposition at Columbus.

Mr. CANNON. I will reply to the gentleman. So far as Cincinnati is concerned, the committee was satisfied that Cincinnati, with 400,000 population and with great hotels, had the capacity to entertain the people who should visit that exposition from various parts of the country.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman does not answer my question. I asked him distinctly whether he was not aware of the fact that the Legislature of Ohio had recommended that an appropriation be made for the Columbus exposition.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will maintain that fiery, impetuous soul of his, I will answer his question, but I will answer in my own way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CANNON. I decline to yield until I have answered the question of the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to help you answer it.

Mr. CANNON. I want to answer it myself, and do not want any help at this time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You will probably answer it wrongly.

Mr. CANNON. Possibly I may; but I will answer it from my own standpoint, and will yield to the gentleman later.

We believe the exposition at Cincinnati to be a great national exposition, with 400,000 people there to entertain all those who may visit that exhibition. We recommended that appropriation and it was made. Now, it may be that that was a mistake; it may be that we ought not to have recommended the appropriation, and that the House and Senate ought not to have passed it. I have no pride of opinion in these matters; I have no pride in regard to being "consistent." If gentlemen think I have, they mistake me. I act upon each question according to the light that I have when it arises. I do not see the propriety, after we have appropriated for this exhibition at Cincinnati, of making another exhibit at an exposition of far less importance in the same State and within five hours' ride of Cincinnati by railway.

If it is the sense of the House that this appropriation for Columbus should be made, I hope the amendment for Richmond will be accepted and adopted. If it is the sense of the House to make the appropriation for Columbus and Richmond, I hope the amendment for Augusta will be accepted and adopted, because Richmond and Augusta, in my opinion, appeal with as great force to Congress as does Columbus. More than that, if it is the sense of the House to take this departure, I hope the bill will be so amended as to grant aid to Atlanta for the exposition for the colored people there, to show the progress they have made since they obtained their freedom. More than that, I hope that every State fair association and that every great city that wants to make an exposition, like Chicago, like Minneapolis, like Omaha, like Kansas City—all these points, east and west, and north and south—shall also, under this proposed departure from the policy we have journeyed on heretofore, have these exhibits so the people can see them.

And, Mr. Speaker, if we enter on this policy it is the part of wisdom and economy that we should appropriate half a million of dollars or more for the preparation of several sets of exhibits, three, four, five, or six of them, leisurely and when it can be done with less expense, so we will have everything in readiness to be taken from one part of the country to another. As it is now the exhibits made for the National Museum are needed there. When you take them away you will destroy them in a short time. While I have no prejudice to Columbus, and while I have the kindest feelings toward the gentleman who represents it so well and so ably, and towards his magnificent State, and toward the city of Columbus, yet I need not say that we have come to a point where the roads fork, we must stop and refuse to travel in the direction in which gentlemen want to go, or we must enter upon the road with our eyes open and say we will amend the bill so as to help the other States which want help, and we will then adopt such proper legislation as will aid a great many of these exhibits which can be held everywhere, from the Lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean.

Mr. BRUMM. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. Is there not a difference here in favor of the exposition to be held at Columbus over those to be held at Richmond and Augusta? Is not one national while the others are local?

Mr. CANNON. It may be that one is national and the others are local. You have one national or international exposition running now at Cincinnati.

Mr. BRUMM rose.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer your question. You have one international exposition now running at Cincinnati. Are you going to have another international exposition running up at Columbus? Two rival shows—I do not know whether they are in fact or not, and I do not care how that is, or which gets it; but I do not believe the exposition at Columbus should be preferred to those at Augusta and Richmond. It may be they require a larger exhibit at Columbus than they do at Richmond; I do not know how that is; but I have not a single doubt if you enter on this departure here and now you will have to listen to an appeal from different States. The State of Illinois may through her Legislature recommend an exposition.

Mr. WEAVER. And the State of Iowa will also want an appropriation when that State comes to celebrate her golden wedding into the American Union.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. As the gentleman from Iowa has stated, we shall also have to make an appropriation for a proper exhibit in the State of Iowa. You are bound in good faith to do these things, and I want gentlemen to walk right up and look at the matter here and now before determining the course we are to pursue in the future. If you enter on this departure, do it with your eyes open, and then accept the consequences.

Mr. BRUMM. These others are not State fairs, but mere local exhibits.

Mr. CANNON. It may be that the exhibition at Columbus is different from the others at Richmond and Augusta.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The exposition at Columbus represents the Archæological Society of the State, the Horticultural Society, the College Society, and other State societies, while the State fair does nothing more than permit its grounds to be used. At Columbus the State of Ohio and the counties of Ohio, with fifty different archæological societies, have undertaken this exposition——

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman remember he is speaking in my time?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You asked me a question, and I am merely answering it. At the exposition in Columbus the State of Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, together with all the societies to which I have referred, have accepted invitations to be present and to participate.

Mr. CANNON. You are talking in my time. I will state again I accept the gentleman's statement, and it may be the exposition at Columbus is of a different character from those at Richmond and Augusta; but I will also state that I doubt the policy of the United States sending an exhibit to Columbus under all the circumstances; and if you do, I express my opinion, which I have a right to hold, that you ought not to deny it to any association which rises to the dignity of a State association or which may ask for it.

I now yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question, and I want to ask it for information.

Mr. CANNON. I can not occupy all of the time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX in the chair). The gentleman has forty minutes remaining.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, as I want to ask a question for information?

Mr. CANNON. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will take care of the gentleman before the time is out. I now ask the Clerk to read an amendment I propose to offer to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is desirable to encourage the colored people in their efforts to promote the industrial progress of the race by the holding of a national industrial exposition in the years 1888 and 1889, in the city of Atlanta, Ga., to be held under the joint auspices of the United States, the Colored World's Fair Association of America, an institution for the public welfare, incorporated under the general laws of Georgia, and of the city in which it may be located, and in which the works of art, field products, live-stock, manufactures, machinery, and other articles raised, fabricated, produced, or owned by colored people throughout the United States of America will be the chief exhibit, and which is designed to cultivate a thorough knowledge of the arts and trades among the colored people, create among them a stimulus to industry, and show the results of their progress in education, art, manufactures, the science of forestry, and horticulture, and furnish to the Government information as to the educational and industrial progress of its colored citizens; and

Whereas such an exhibition should be national in its character, and should have the sanction of the Congress of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States may, upon the recommendation of the board of directors of the Colored World's Fair Association of America, appoint eleven commissioners, who shall constitute a board of management of a national industrial exposition of the arts, mechanics, and products of the colored race throughout the United States of America, to be held in the years 1889 and 1890, under the auspices of the Colored World's Fair Association of America.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States may, upon the recommendation of the board of management of said national industrial exposition, appoint one commissioner and one alternate commissioner for each State and Territory, whose functions shall be defined by the said board of management.

SEC. 3. That all of said commission shall be appointed within three months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 4. That said board of management shall hold its meetings in the city of Atlanta, State of Georgia, and that a majority of said board of managers shall have full power to make all needful rules and regulations for its government.

SEC. 5. That said board of management shall report to the President of the United States a suitable date for opening and closing the exposition, a schedule of appropriate ceremonies for opening or dedicating the same, and such other matters as in their judgment may be deemed important.

SEC. 6. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 7. That whenever the President shall be informed by the said board of management that provision has been made for suitable buildings, or the erection of the same, for the purposes of said exposition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $250,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a loan to the said national industrial exposition, to be used and employed by the board of management thereof to augment and enhance the success of the national industrial exposition in such manner as said board of mangement may determine, and in accordance with the provisions of this act: Provided, That the said sum shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States on the drafts of the president and secretary of the board of management of the national industrial exposition authorized by order of said board, one-third of the amount immediately after the passage of this act, upon being satisfied that $20,000 has been contributed and paid into the said board for the purposes of the exposition by the contributors to and shareholders of the national industrial exposition, and the remainder in two monthly payments thereafter upon being satisfied that each of the prior payments has been faithfully applied as required by this act; and for this purpose he shall have free access to the accounts and all transactions of said board: Provided further, That no greater amount shall be expended, or liability or indebtedness of any kind incurred upon buildings, grounds, and preparations than the aggregate sum that may be paid in by the subscribers to the capital stock and by donations, and the amount of the loan provided herein: And provided further, That in the distribution of the amounts that may remain in the treasury of the board of management after the payment of the current expenses of administration the amount of the appropriation hereinbefore made shall be paid in full into the Treasury of the United States before any dividend or percentage of profits or assests shall be paid to the holders of said stock or contributors: Provided further, That the Government of the United States shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for any debt or obligation created or incurred by the national industrial exposition or its board of management, or for any sum whatever in addition to the amount appropriated by this act; and that adequate space for such exhibits as the Government of the United States may see proper to make at said exposition shall be furnished free of all charge by said board: Provided further, That no sum shall be paid to the said board of management of said exposition until after the president and secretary and a majority of the members of said board shall have executed a bond, with good and solvent security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of $100,000, to sufficiently secure the safe-keeping and the faithful disbursement of the sum hereby appropriated, and for the faithful observance of this act with regard to the limitation of expenditures and liabilities as fixed herein, and for the repayment to the Government of the United States of the surplus of proceeds of said exposition remaining after payment of the current expenses of administration, said repayment in no case to exceed the loan. The receipt of the loan herein made, or any part thereof, by said board of management shall be a full acceptance of all the trusts, conditions, and obligations of this act by the said board of management and by the corporation created under the laws of the State of Georgia and designated as "The Colored World's Fair Association of America."

SEC. 9. That in case articles shall be imported for the sole purpose of exhibition at said fair, said articles being the work or production of the colored race, they shall be admitted without the payment of duty or of customs charges under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles as shall be sold in the United States or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importation shall be subject to the duties, if any are imposed on like articles, by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation: And provided further, That in case any articles imported under the provisions of this act shall be withdrawn for consumption or shall be sold without payment of duty as required by law, all penalties prescribed by the revenue laws shall be applied and enforced against such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of such withdrawal or sale.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to make a point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make the point of order against the amendment under the language of Rule XVI, clause 7, the latter part of that clause, which reads:

> And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

My point of order is that this is a distinctive proposition in itself. If this bill by way of illustration may be termed one private bill, that offered by way of an amendment to it is another. If this bill may be regarded in the light of a proposition to erect, for instance, a public building at the city of Columbus, it would certainly be held not in order to amend it by a proposition to erect a public building at the city of Atlanta.

The proposition under consideration is one to enable the Executive Departments of the Government to participate in an exposition and celebration to be held at a certain point under certain auspices in the State of Ohio. The one offered by the gentleman from Iowa is a proposition to loan money, and to assist in establishing a quasi corporation, as you may term it, for the purpose of holding an exposition in some other part of the United States. It seems to me, therefore, under the clause of the rule just read that it can not be permitted under color of an amendment; nor is it germane, as a gentleman on my left suggests to me.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that I would make in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio on the point of order is simply to the effect that neither of these is a private bill, and it does not come within the rule he cites.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Excuse me; I only gave that as an illustration.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. They are both subjects relating to Government aid for certain State expositions or celebrations; and the general subject being up in the proposition of the Senate, now under consideration by the House, any amendment bearing upon that proposition is necessarily germane.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. It is very evident that this is not a private bill, nor is the amendment in the nature of a private bill, but a general bill, and the amendment would not be in order under the rule quoted by the gentleman from Ohio. It is a proposition on a subject not different from that under consideration. Both relate to Government assistance to industrial expositions.

The Chair would therefore overrule the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the House desires to know something of the character of this general proposition, I will endeavor to throw such light upon the subject as I can in a very few moments.

I was chairman of the subcommittee appointed from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred all these bills in regard to aid on the part of the Government to State expositions. The first that came to our committee is what was known as the Cincinnati bill; and it was followed in quick succession by several others.

The Ohio bills, Cincinnati, Columbus, and Marietta, were all recognized by the Legislature of that State and recommended for favorable action to Congress. The Cincinnati bill came before us on the plea or being a great national exposition, taking in the celebration of the opening of the Northwestern Territory, and was expected to be participated in by all those States that now enjoy the fruits of that addition to our common country. That appealed to the judgment of the committee, and after a full hearing it met with a favorable report.

But before final action by the Committee on Appropriations, a bill substantially similar to and modeled after the Cincinnati bill, providing for the Columbus exposition, was introduced and referred to the committee and to the subcommittee. It was also referred to the full Committee on Appropriations, but was voted against for the reason that if Cincinnati was to receive this $150,000, in round numbers, for the international or great national celebration of the Northwest Territory, that Columbus should not be entitled to run a similar exposition, and that we were doing well enough to give them $150,000 to Cincinnati. So that the Columbus bill was voted down. Subsequently the colored people and the city council of the city of Atlanta, Ga.—I think the county officers generally, and all or nearly all the officers connected with the city affairs and the county—recommended this exposition of the colored race which is covered by my amendment. That also came to our subcommittee and received its favorable indorsement. Subsequently the proposition of my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] came in for a large State exposition, where they were also, like Columbus, going to invite other States and the Canadas and other countries to participate, something to be carried on on a grand scale, the tobacco product of the United States being one of the leading features; and one proposition after another piled in upon us until we found it absolutely necessary to call a halt.

The only one that received the sanction of the subcommittee was the proposition covered by the amendment that has just been read in behalf of the colored race. I supported that in full committee, as did some other members, if I may be permitted to say that, but it was acted upon adversely. When I found the temper of the committee to be that they thought they must call a halt and go no further in this direction, and that it was suggested that they had gone far enough when we had recognized Cincinnati, I was then unwilling to recognize any other proposition. My judgment was that if the colored race, struggling after a hundred years of slavery and of ignorance, could not have the help of the General Government to lift them on their feet, and knowing that the section of their country is not as rich as ours in the North, if they could not have sanction and approval, then I was unwilling to support any other proposition; and so the Committee on Appropriations took adverse action on every one of these propositions. The bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], which is now pending before the House, has not a favorable report from any committee of this House. He gets it in here now under a motion to discharge the Committee on Appropriations from its further consideration, and to consider it in the House in the teeth of the adverse action of that committee.

Now, I have no feeling on this subject except to this extent. I believe if we are to go further with Government aid to this class of cases, when the colored race which has already appealed to us—on a showing, too, that was an awakener to all of us—that they might have aid at Atlanta and showing by statistics the advance they had made in the arts, in education, in music, and in manufactures, I say, if we are not to let that hard struggling race come in here and have Government aid of this character of national exhibits, then I am against Columbus, and against Richmond. I am against Augusta, and if I had it before me now, I would be against Cincinnati. That is my proposition.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] any question he may ask now.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will ask you whether this colored exposition that you spoke of is not to take place in 1889 and 1890?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It was intended to be in 1888 and 1889, but in order to enable the management to make better preparations it was deferred to 1889 and 1890. Some ask what is the nature of this proposition of the gentleman from Ohio. It is to make an appropriation to enable the Government to attend as an exhibitor; to give $40,000 to take exhibits from the Departments of the Government to Columbus for their exhibition. Now, unless some gentleman asks me a question I want to yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as conferees on its part Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PLUMB, and Mr. GORMAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3178) to remove the political disabilities of William L. Bradford; in which concurrence was requested.

OHIO CENTENNIAL.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that we have reached a point where we ought to draw the line. We began this business with a loan to Philadelphia. We continued it by a donation to New Orleans. We followed that by a donation to Cincinnati, and I believe Marietta. Now comes Richmond, Va., Atlanta and Augusta, Ga., and Kansas City, Mo., and they all demand appropriations from the public Treasury. I am opposed to them all. The places to which appropriations have heretofore been made should not be quoted as precedents. To use the language of one of the old Revolutionary fathers, they should be cited only to show "the enormities towards which precedents travel." That is what they ought to be cited for, and for no other purpose.

There never was a truer saying than what was said centuries ago, that "the treasury which is drained by wasteful extravagance must be refilled by crime;" for it is a crime to tax the people to replace money which has been improvidently expended. This whole business should be referred to the localities and the States in which these expositions are held. Which one of the delegations here can go to its own State Legislature and get donations to be expended here and there for purposes of this kind? If they can do it successfully, let them go there and do it. That is the proper place for them to go. This is not the proper place.

We have run this whole business into the ground. We are not satisfied with appropriations for national expositions, but we must have international expositions, and then State expositions, and presently we shall have county expositions, and there will not be an enterprise of this kind gotten up in any State in the Union that will not be knocking at the doors of Congress for an appropriation from the United States Treasury. It has reached a point where it is about to become a public scandal. We have monuments and expositions, national and international, and lately we have started in to celebrate battle-fields, although there are a thousand battle-fields in this country, each of which would have to be celebrated if we once entered upon that course. It is time for Congress to draw the line, and it should be drawn right here, so that we may stop this business at once and forever.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I now yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER. I am not disposed to oppose the appropriation for an exhibit to be made at Columbus, Ohio; but it seems to me that Ohio, having had already two appropriations, is as prolific in asking for appropriations for expositions as her sons are nimble in seeking office.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Ohio has had only one appropriation of this kind.

Mr. WARNER. Only one. Well, sir, while these appropriations are going around I think that the fifth State in the Union has some claim, and if the purpose of making these displays by the Government is the education of the people, then I say place your exhibits where the most people will see them. Therefore I shall offer an amendment, to be voted on at the proper time, asking for a like appropriation for like exhibits to be displayed at the national exposition in the city of Kansas, Mo. There, sir, I guaranty to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], without detracting in the least from his beautiful city, that where one person will see the exhibits displayed in the city of Columbus, from twenty-five to one hundred people will see those which are displayed in the city of Kansas. Sir, when you place your exhibits there you will be placing them in the newer section of the country, you will be placing them near the geographical center of the Union; you will be placing them near the center of gravity of the population of the United States; you will be placing them in a city whose growth is unparalleled in the history of this country, and in the midst of a people who have made the great American desert to bud and blossom as the rose; a people that have more business and less politics to the square inch than any other people on the continent; a people that erected for the agricultural and mechanical displays of the great Southwest the finest crystal palace from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

As these appropriations are going the rounds, I urge, sir, that Missouri shall not be neglected. Let Columbus have her appropriation. Let Augusta have her appropriation. Let Richmond, the proud city of the mother of States, have her appropriation. The gentleman [Mr. WISE], when he speaks of Virginia as the mother of States, let him not forget one of the children of the mother of States, let him not forget the city which I have the honor to represent, the favored child of one of the older daughters of that proud old mother. [Applause.]

The amendment of Mr. WARNER was read, as follows:

And that the further sum of $40,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated for a like exhibit to be made at the national exposition to be held at the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri, in September and October, 1888.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment is not in order at this time, as there are already two amendments pending. The amendment, the Chair understands, has been read merely for information.

Mr. WARNER. I offered the amendment trusting that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] would not object and feeling confident that no other gentleman would object. I have had it read for information, and I shall ask for a vote on it at the proper time.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me an unhealthy sign, an evidence of the degeneracy of the public mind, that delegations are continually flocking here to this capital from different State fairs proposed to be held, in order to get the Government to put upon wheels its exhibits and send them around from State to State. It seems to me we are coming very rapidly to the condition of the Roman Republic in its last days, when the cry of the people to the Government was "Bread and the circus!" But if we are to go into the circus business, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that we ought to do it systematically. There has perhaps never been, and I think never will be, a more favorable opportunity for the United States to enter that ring than just now. Old John Robinson, the king of circus men, is recently dead. He catered to the amusement of the people of this country during at least two generations.

If the Government of the United States is to undertake now to supply his place, I suggest that it ought to be done on something like a regular system. As has been indicated, it is not fair to give to one State or city what you deny to another State or city; and the only way to deal in this matter according to the maxim that "equality is equity" is, it seems to me, to establish a regular traveling exhibit. Let this Government have as many different cars built as there are different Departments—one for the Navy Department, one for the War Department, one for the Agricultural Department, one for the Smithsonian Institution, and so on down to the end of the list. My friend on the left, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. HATCH], suggests to me that there ought to be at least two cars for the Agricultural Department, and I agree with him. I am willing to accept that amendment. When you come to build these cars let them be built at Government expense and let them be fit for all occasions; let them be built in magnificent style; and let us have, not a railway postal clerk, but an agent of the Government appointed to take charge of each one of these cars—an expert who will be fully and thoroughly acquainted with all these exhibits and can tell glibly and eloquently to the people of every section how great the Government is, as evidenced by these exhibits. I submit that if the gentleman from Illinois will only frame an amendment covering these points this House stands ready here and now to vote for it and substitute it for this partial, unjust measure of the gentleman from Ohio. It is very clear that the bill he has introduced here is not satisfactory, because it is intended only for a particular locality. I am sure an amendment of the kind I have suggested, if properly draughted, will carry this House.

Mr. HOOKER. Does not the gentleman think that if the people had been made a little better acquainted with the interests and progress of the various Departments and their management it would have been better, and might have prevented the expenditure of $385,000,000 in that Department over which in this House the gentleman from Alabama now presides?

Mr. HERBERT. I think possibly it might.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] seemed to object to the passage of the original bill because he thought we should have some system; that we had come to where "the roads fork," and should understand how far we are to go in these appropriations. I agree with the gentleman that there ought to be some system, that there ought to be a point at which we should stop; but I believe that point is indicated by the nature of the exhibition that asks aid. If it is a national exhibition or an international exhibition, an exhibition to celebrate some great historical event, and to have an educational influence over the country at large, I think we ought not to hesitate to grant any reasonable appropriation. But when appropriations are asked for State institutions or for celebrations such as the one contemplated at Richmond or at Augusta or at Kansas City, then I think we can draw the line of demarkation. The proposition is a very plain one. Whenever the institution is simply a local one, I do not think that Congress ought to grant any appropriation, but when it is national or international, when it is designed to celebrate some great historical event, as for instance the centennial celebration at Philadelphia, or the exposition at New Orleans, or the celebration at Yorktown, I believe that Congress ought to discriminate and should recognize the propriety of such appropriations.

I am therefore in favor of this bill, provided the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] be adopted, because the exhibition to which it refers is in the line I have indicated. It is a national celebration; it is a celebration by a race of people, a celebration that is not local, but of interest to the entire country. It is designed to represent the achievements of the colored people of the country, and to show the country and the world the advance that has been made by this race notwithstanding the great difficulties under which they have been laboring. We have had a colored convention at Indianapolis; representatives of the colored people have been assembled there. It is true the affair frittered out and did not amount to much. I would like to have a celebration that will not fritter out, one that will amount to something.

But I say I will vote for this bill if you will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. They are both in the same line; they are parallel with each other; they are national and even international in their nature, and should be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I asked the question a few moments ago whether in the case of the Philadelphia Centennial Exposition the aid furnished by the Government was not in the nature of a loan. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said there was an appropriation in part and a loan—I understood him to say, in part. I have the act before me, and it provides for a loan to the extent of a million and a half of dollars to aid in the erection of buildings, every dollar of which loan was returned to the United States after some litigation, I believe.

In the case of the exposition at New Orleans a million and a half of dollars were taken out of the Treasury of the United States and loaned on what was then considered to be sufficient security for its return, but not one dollar of that appropriation was ever returned into the Treasury, which satisfied me of the bad policy of even loaning money to aid expositions. The more recent policy seems to be to give the money wanted without any promise of a return. It is not one of the constitutional purposes of this Government to make such appropriations. It is entirely outside of the powers granted to Congress by the framers of the Constitution. I vote against all such propositions. The United States Government was never intended to engage in the show business.

But, sir, I must say that of all the propositions now pending the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is the most meritorious. It proposes an appropriation to enable the colored people of the United States to hold an exposition at Atlanta, Ga. That amendment, in my candid judgment, is more meritorious than the original proposition. They have more recently reached the state of responsibility and citizenship, and need much more than the white people of Ohio the aid of an appropriation from the Treasury to enable them to exhibit the progress they have made in the mechanic arts, domestic and agricultural industry; and while I am opposed to appropriating any money which we have not the rightful power to appropriate, yet if this thing is to be done, right or wrong, then I insist on giving the negroes a showing.

Sir, if this show business at the expense of the whole people is to be carried any further, if this bill is to be passed, against which I protest, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be adopted, and the colored people, whose claim is the most equitable, may have an equal benefit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I reserve whatever time I have remaining, and will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will take the floor, and yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I shall refer once more to an important fact connected with the great international centennial exposition held in the city of Philadelphia in 1876. I have done it before, but I think it is only right and necessary to put the fact on record whenever occasion brings the matter to the attention of the House. That fact is that the loan on the part of the Government of the United States to the centennial exposition of a million and a half of dollars was repaid. That was said at the time by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], but I wish to state now for myself that that centennial exposition did not cost the Government of the United States one dollar except for the expense of sending the exhibits of the various governmental Departments to the city of Philadelphia, and that expense was not very great.

I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States came very slowly and grudgingly to allow these exhibits to be sent to that exposition. It was not, perhaps, until the whole world, until every nation of the earth, had determined to make an exhibit at that centennial exhibition that the Government consented also to come in.

Now, I do not think when Congress made that loan of a million and a half of dollars, the intention was it should be collected from those who had started that great exhibition at Philadelphia. I am rather inclined to think, because it must be a success as everything of that kind undertaken by the citizens of Philadelphia or Pennsylvania is a success, that the Government would have absolved the centennial commission from the repayment of that amount. But it was brought forward and the question was taken to court. The lower court decided in favor of the centennial commission but the Supreme Court of the United States, after hearing argument on each side, decided that the million and a half of dollars should be paid, and the finance committee of that centennial exhibition paid it back to the last dollar and the last cent.

Now, sir, there is nothing of which I am prouder as a Philadelphian than the success which attended that exposition at Philadelphia, which was, so to speak, the pioneer of all these expositions; and the present proposition, although in a less degree, is similar to the plan adopted at Philadelphia. The idea started from there when the great centennial of our independence was proposed. I repeat, I feel proud of that fact; and I as a Philadelphian could do no less than vote the aid of the Government as far as my vote can go for any such exhibit anywhere within the limits of this country. I do not see why Congress should hesitate to make a sufficient appropriation to enable the conveyance from the National Museum here to any point in this country of such exhibits belonging to that establishment as are now assembled there. I believe that I am right in the suggestion that the idea of the erection of that National Museum emanated from the centennial exposition at Philadelphia, and that the magnificent collection of curiosities and treasures of art gathered there from all parts of the world, affording an undying subject of interest, attractiveness, and as an educational feature unsurpassed in this country to our people, is the outgrowth of the centennial held at Philadelphia in 1876. A large amount of the Government exhibits were returned to it from that exposition, and it was difficult to dispose of them satisfactorily until the idea was originated of having a grand national museum here in this city where all such works could be treasured up for the future.

Mr. Speaker, under these circumstances I could not but vote for this proposition, because I voted for the appropriation for the Centennial at Philadelphia, and I voted for the appropriation at New Orleans, although I knew when I voted it that the million of dollars then appropriated would never be returned to the Government. I do not hesitate to say that I am not disappointed that it has not been returned. These expositions have been of such great advantage to all parts of our country that a million of dollars lost or sunk in one part of it, where perhaps there was no success, or possibly no such successful management of the system as took place in Philadelphia, is no injury to our people, and I do not feel that I should hesitate to vote for this loan of these articles from the National Museum on that account.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I shall add but a very few words to what I have already said in this connection.

In offering the amendment I have had the honor to offer I wish it distinctly understood that I mean no opposition whatever to the bill of my friend from Ohio, and if I thought I could benefit him, and the interest he has in view, by its withdrawal, I would cheerfully do so. I said when I offered the amendment that I thought Virginia had as much right to the appropriation for the exposition at Richmond as the State of Ohio has for her exposition at Cincinnati and at Marietta. No State in this Union bore a more conspicuous part in that event which is proposed to be celebrated by this exposition at Cincinnati, at Columbus, and at Marietta, than the old Commonwealth of Virginia. She not only conveyed to the National Government all her rights and interests in the Northwest Territory, but I want here to emphasize the fact that in doing so she dedicated it forever to freedom, and made it impossible that slavery could with her consent ever exist in that Northwest Territory.

I asked my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] why this appropriation was voted to Cincinnati and not to Columbus, stating what I knew to be the fact, that the Legislature of Ohio had requested that it should be held at the capital of that State. His reply was that Cincinnati had the population. I want to call attention to the fact that in the bill in which an appropriation was made for Cincinnati, he also, as a member of that committee, voted an appropriation for Marietta, in Ohio, not more than two hours' ride from Cincinnati.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. WISE. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. I believe your amendment is only——

Mr. WISE. I am just going to explain it.

Mr. OATES (continuing). To get what is left of the appropriation; and what I want to ask is if the gentleman thinks anything is going to be left?

Mr. WISE. Now, I want to mention a fact to this House which was known to that committee when they refused this appropriation. I went to them as a Representative of the State of Virginia, asking not a dollar of appropriation, but I told them while they were giving $150,000 for the exposition at Marietta and at Cincinnati, that if they would give the State of Virginia only the naked authority to let the Government have an exhibit at this exposition in Richmond, Va., that my people would pay every dollar of the expense themselves. My amendment now asks that you will give us that authority. We do not want your money out of the national Treasury. Give us the right to have the Government represented in the exposition at Richmond and my people will bear every dollar of the expense.

Gentlemen here are asking $200,000 for Ohio, while Virginia asks only the right to pay the expense herself for the Government exposition in the State.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. But you ask to have what is left.

Mr. WISE. I do not know that anything will be left.

Another word, Mr. Speaker. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], to whom I wish now to make my profound acknowledgment for his kindness in giving me a hearing before his committee, has spoken of the proposition to give the colored people at Atlanta an appropriation for their exposition. I unite with my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] in saying that I think if any people ought to be recognized, they deserve recognition and assistance. We ought to make no distinction. But I protest in the name of the Constitution, I solemnly protest against legislation based, as that is proposed to be based, upon discrimination on account of color. I would not vote an appropriation to any race, as a race, because it is unconstitutional.

I recognize no distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition. If you make the appropriation make it because it is right. Let us have none of this class legislation here. I am free to acknowledge that it is entitled to as much recognition as mine, but no more, and especially do I say this because the gentleman from Iowa says, "Those are colored men," and makes that the chief ground of his claim. Now, I do not think a colored man is entitled to any more rights than a white man under the Constitution. The gentleman from Iowa may think so, but I draw the line right there.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Do you think the colored man is entitled to the same rights as the white man?

Mr. WISE. I do. I have just said so; but according to your argument he ought to have more rights than the white man. Now, I think you are just as good as a colored man. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the House that it is a fair proposition that these several bills and amendments stand or fall according to the merit they severally possess; and I submit, further, that it is hardly fair to attempt to destroy the bill of my colleague, by loading it down with amendments which have no other object in view than the defeat of the bill to which they are attached. When I was a member of the Ohio senate I attempted to secure an appropriation to erect a monument to perpetuate the memory of a citizen of national reputation and influence, whose public service had been such that he deserved well of the entire country; whose career was one of great brilliancy. The bill did not pass, and for the reason that each of several senators felt called upon to attach to that bill a proposition to erect a monument to commemorate some successful school teacher or other excellent citizen of his neighborhood. Now, the school teacher might have been a number one man; he might have been worthy of being remembered by his neighbors and associates; but it seemed to me unjust to freight down the proposition to erect a monument to Tom Corwin (whose memory is still and must ever be dear to every Buckeye), because there was no wisdom or propriety in erecting a monument to a successful lawyer, or a successful school teacher, albeit they might have been of that class known as God's noblemen. If there is merit in the proposition of my colleague let us vote for it, if not, vote it down. It does not follow because the measure of my colleague proposes an appropriation to defray the expenses of the several Departments in making an exhibit in the Mississippi Valley of that which in large part belongs to the people of that region, having been contributed by them or at their cost and expense, that it would be wise to vote for another proposition which is peculiarly local in its character and influence and has relation solely to local enterprise. I am not saying that any of these enterprises are local. Their merits can be discussed when we reach them one after another.

What is this proposition? It does not call for a donation at all. It is not in the shape of a donation such as was made to Philadelphia and New Orleans; nothing of the kind. This House made no donation to the States west of the Alleghanies when it voted to pay the expenses incident to conducting departmental exhibits at Cincinnati. It is not a Cincinnati exhibition; it is not an Ohio exhibition; but old Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, and the whole West and South, and in fact, Pennsylvania and the East joined in the request that of the vast collection of objects of interest, objects of value, historic and otherwise, gathered at this capital at the expense of labor and money contributed by all the people, a small per cent. shall for the advantage and pleasure of the people west of the Alleghanies be placed in one or more of the great expositions organized by citizens of that section in the interest of our State and national development.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman explain the difference between appropriating money to aid in carrying the exhibits there and making an appropriation outright for the exhibition?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will explain to my honored friend the difference between a donation in the sense in which that word was used and an appropriation to pay the expense of making an exhibit. In the one instance the Government makes an appropriation to defray the expense of preparing for the exhibition, such as erecting buildings of various kinds, etc., and making other suitable preparation for the conduct of the exposition. Nothing of that kind is asked for by the people west of the Alleghanies.

It was properly asked at New Orleans, and we granted it; but in the case under consideration we say to the General Government, the people of the West and South have paid taxes for all these years and have contributed to collecting at this capital articles and objects of rare interest to all our citizens—articles and objects which can not be obtained elsewhere nor be seen by those at whose cost and expense they were collected unless specimens or samples shall be taken to suitable and convenient places and there exhibited—and this, we say, should on suitable and proper occasions be done, and the Government be required, not to make a donation to an exposition, but to defray the necessary expense of making its own exhibit. We ask that of the things our people have helped to supply a sample or fragment be exhibited, and that of the vast sums those same people have poured into your Treasury there be appropriated enough to defray the cost of the exhibit.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If my friend will allow me, I will state to him that it was not a donation to the centennial at Philadelphia.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not understand that it was in the nature of a donation, but my recollection is that we did not get back the entire amount appropriated.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. You got every dollar back.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We got about $1,500,000.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do object to the word "donation" going into the RECORD in that connection.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not care so far as the purposes of this debate are concerned whether we got it back or no.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do care.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. For the sake of peace, I will agree that we got it all back from Philadelphia. [Laughter.] I do not want to do the historic old city of Philadelphia any injustice. Now I hope my friend will rest his soul in patience, and let faith have its perfect work. [Laughter.]

I do not sympathize with the proposition that we must make an appropriation for all that they ask or none. Here stands a monument in this valley erected as a tribute to the character of a great man, the first citizen of the Republic who was identified with, in truth the hero of a great revolution. Would any member feel authorized to rise in his place and say, "I do not think we ought to vote to erect or complete that monument unless we also vote to erect a shaft to commemorate the character and service of a worthy justice of the peace in another valley." It is a question as to whether the man or the occasion is worthy the recognition.

The gentleman from Virginia has well said that that old Commonwealth gave to the Union all the great Northwest Territory and dedicated it forever to freedom. That was an event in character and significance second to none in the history of this Republic, and it is so regarded not only by our fellow-citizens of the United States but by the civilized world, since it marked the dawn of a new era in the growth and development of the United States and exercised a controlling influence on the destiny of the Republic. Was that great event worthy of commemoration? Was the place selected a proper place? If so, we did worthily and well in making an appropriation to aid in that celebration. I refer to this simply for the purpose of riveting the attention of the House upon the fact that that exposition is not a local matter, that it has reference to the commemoration of an event to which every man here cites his children, so that when they read the history of their country they will dwell with pride upon that epoch and rejoice in the triumph of the spirit of liberty which forever excluded the institution of slavery from that fairest portion of our common heritage.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I always yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then I must draw on my friend [Mr. OUTHWAITE] for one or two minutes more.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Questions are raised here as to the merits of the Cincinnati and Columbus expositions, and the gentleman from Virginia claims that those questions have not been answered. Now, as to the Cincinnati exposition, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] if the State Legislatures and the governors of the different States did not ask us to make an appropriation for that purpose, thus making it a national question? And, on the other hand, is it not the fact that the Columbus exposition is local to the State of Ohio, excepting in so far as those in charge of it seek to extend it by their own efforts?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have not been as intimately identified with the history of the Columbus exposition as my honored colleague, Mr. OUTHWAITE. My friend, however, is right in saying that the States of the West and South, Old Virginia and Pennsylvania, took an interest in the Cincinnati exposition on account of its historic importance and imparted to it a national character. There is no doubt about that, and it is only fair to say that, distinguishing between the two expositions, that at Cincinnati and that at Columbus, I insisted that each should stand upon its own merits. The Ohio exposition, however, embraces a large range, which was not contemplated in the Cincinnati exposition; hence I have favored and now favor an appropriation for that also. So far as Marietta is concerned, gentlemen know that certain articles of historic character, intended to be and which are exhibited at Cincinnati were while in transitu taken to Marietta. This was done under the provisions of the law providing for the departmental exhibits.

Touching the events celebrated at Marietta, Cincinnati, and Columbus, we drew upon Massachusetts and upon old Virginia and Kentucky and other States, and those States responded grandly, and I submit to this House that nothing yet contributed to the historical literature of this country will outlive the addresses that were delivered at Marietta by Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, and by Senators HOAR and EVARTS and others. The events we were celebrating were grand and historic, and the orators and orations worthy of the occasion.

Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to a remark of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER]. He was peculiarly happy when he said that if these expositions had been encouraged and had been more frequent in the past, so that the people of different sections of this country might have met together and learned more of each other, there would not now be an enormous war debt hanging over the Republic. I concur in that remark, and although in dollars and cents we apparently lost a couple of millions by the New Orleans enterprise, I say to the House that my observation and investigation satisfies me that this nation has gained ten dollars for every one she invested there.

On that occasion the people of the different sections met together and there they learned more of each other and of the vast and varied resources of their common country, not only in natural products, but of the useful things produced in the arts. There they learned the better ways and the best and cheapest methods.

A single word more. I only ask that this proposition of my colleague [Mr. OUTHWAITE] shall not be voted down by reason of the peculiar amendments that may be attached to it. If it is a worthy proposition, as I certainly think it is, let us vote for it. I shall vote for it with all my heart. I say again that it is not for Columbus alone, it is not for Ohio alone, it is not for Indiana nor for Illinois alone, but it is for all that section of country that we ask that the several Departments of the Government may contribute by way of an exhibit on this occasion a small portion of that which those States and that section of the country have placed in store at the national capital.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN].

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, Ohio is one hundred years old this year, and her Representatives upon this floor are entirely willing that whenever any State in this Union becomes one hundred years of age she may send out her invitations to the other States, and to the people of the whole country, to come within her borders and see what progress she has made in a century, and that the nation as a whole shall also be present, even though it costs a small sum to secure its presence.

That is what Ohio has done this year with reference to the United States. She does not stand here begging that Congress shall appropriate any sum of money to assist her in making this celebration or in providing this "circus," as some gentleman has put it; but she asks that the United States Government, through Congress, having heretofore accepted the invitation at her hands to come into her borders this year and see where she stands after one hundred years of growth, should simply pay its own expenses in coming there; that is all. We will take care of you after you get there.

Mr. PAYSON. That is a cordial invitation.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. We have said to the people of the United States that this is not merely a State affair. We have invited them to come there and see the growth of that great Northwest Territory out of which five great States have been carved. You say that Virginia and Connecticut and the East are the parents of Ohio. We invite you as our parents and grandparents to come there and see what your children have done. More than that, we invite the children we have sent out through the Western States to come into our borders and see what we have done while they have been away. And we want the United States Government to be represented in her educational, scientific, and other departments, as she ought to be upon an occasion of this kind.

When it is said the probabilities are that there will be but a few people there, and the accommodations will be scanty, we say to you, "Just come there and we will take care of you; all we want you to do is to come there and participate in this matter, and we will see that you are properly provided for." And when I say that about a year ago the organization known throughout the North as the Grand Army of the Republic provided for the holding of its annual encampment this year at that place, because it would be the occasion of our celebration, you may calculate that there are going to be a few people there from all over this Union.

It seems to me that when we are asking simply that the Congress of the United States shall place on exhibition there free of cost to us the articles of curiosity and educational value belonging to the Government, to remain with us for a while, we are certainly not making, upon an occasion of this kind, a great demand, coming as it does from a portion of the people of the country aggregating at least one-fifth of its whole population. And it does not seem fair to me that these other propositions should be tacked on to this measure, perhaps with a proper purpose in view, but, as it appears to me, with the object of weighting down this measure. I may be wrong; I do not desire to antagonize those several propositions on their separate merits; but it does seem to me the Congress of the United States can afford, and ought to make this appropriation, and that the representatives of the country can afford to come there and see what we are doing It will do us all good to get better acquainted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If gentlemen who are opposing this measure have nothing further to say, I will ask for a vote.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. If other gentlemen are through, I desire to add a word.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I reserve the residue of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I have no feeling in regard to this subject, but have conceived it my duty to make the House understand the exact situation of the matter. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN], who has just spoken, that I have offered my amendment in perfect good faith; and in reply to him and his colleague [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], I desire to say that if we are going to dispose of this question of expositions, these other measures are certainly entitled to consideration; and the fact that a bill has been introduced here which has not even the sanction of a committee, which is not accompanied by any report which members can examine, should not exclude from fair consideration other propositions of greater weight. Now, that the question of appropriation of money for expositions is up, I think the whole subject should be fully considered.

I have offered, from a sense of duty, the amendment for the Atlanta exposition of the colored people. I believe that if $1 should be given to the Columbus exposition, $100,000 should be given to the Atlanta exposition. That is my judgment about the matter. With regard to this celebration of the centennial of the Northwest Territory, we all appreciate the importance of the event; we all appreciate the State of Ohio; we have no feeling against that State, heaven knows. But when we gave $150,000 to Cincinnati on the petition of every State that was interested in the cession of the Northwest Territory, Cincinnati having been selected by Ohio and the surrounding States for the great centennial celebration of that event, I think we did enough in connection with that matter, and that our action should not be made the pretext for every other town or city that may be interested in that event to come here and ask the strengthening aid of the General Government with reference to their local exposition.

I do not sympathize with the remarks of my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] in calling these exhibitions horse shows, or comparing them to John Robinson's performances. I believe in fairs; I believe in expositions; I believe in these methods of quickening the intelligence of the masses by showing them what the cunning workmen in various departments are doing. But if you are going to come here and ask the General Government to aid every State fair, let that be understood by the House before we go any farther. I think my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] has drawn a correct rule for our action; I believe we ought to be governed in our decision by the merits of each particular case. I submit that we have fully covered the just demands of the State of Ohio in making the liberal appropriation already made for the exposition of Cincinnati.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. HERBERT. I believe, like the gentleman from Iowa, that fairs and expositions are valuable and ought to be encouraged; but I think they are matters which should be left to the people in the respective States, and are not affairs in which the Government of the United States hould be asked to take part.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am very glad to have given the gentleman the opportunity to make that explanation. I have now said all that I desire to say.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give briefly my reasons for asking a vote on this question without waiting for the report of a committee. Only three weeks and three days will elapse before this centennial exposition at Columbus must open; and there is very limited time for the preparation of a proper exhibit on the part of the Government and the placing of it in the buildings prepared for it. As to the number of people who will be there, I think I am within bounds when I say that there will be two million persons in attendance at this exposition. It will commence with the encampment of the National Guards; and in the second week the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic will be there, which in itself will bring there fifty thousand men with their wives and children to witness this exhibition. Industrial, religious, scientific, educational, commercial, manufacturing, agricultural, benevolent, temperance, labor, and political associations, State and national, have designated different days when they will be present. The number and kind of such societies that will come to Columbus during this centennial exposition are so numerous as to indicate an enormous attendance of citizens, many of whom never can or will visit this city.

The same reasons which have impelled me to have this bill taken up at this time without waiting for a report from a committee impel me to ask gentlemen who have presented these several amendments to withdraw them and permit this bill to be voted on strictly upon its own separate merits.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. So far as my amendment is concerned, I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his local proposition and let us vote on the great national proposition which my amendment embraces.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the time fixed for the exhibition in the two cases were even the same, and his bill stood where this one does, the gentleman might appeal to me with expectation of my yielding.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Time is equally pressing in both cases.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, no. Our exposition is to commence in September next; the other, I believe, some time in the latter part of 1889, continuing into 1890.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The work in connection with the Atlanta exposition must commence at once, for that is a great national affair.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I will not go on to cite the various resolutions of different States and the several communications which have been received from their governors and others, signifying the intention to take part in the exposition at Columbus. I want to say distinctly that there will be an exposition there; there will be a presentation of science and the arts and industries, exhibiting the progress of the country, and especially the great Northwest during the century. If the National Government, in pursuance of a picayunish and parsimonious policy, chooses to remain away, so far as any representation of its Departments is concerned, or is thus prevented from making an exhibit there by the action of members of this House to-day, that will not detract anything from the greatness of the patriotic, historic occasion which will call together the citizens of the Northwest.

They will come in untold numbers. They will return to their homes better citizens—more enlightened, more encouraged with their prospects for advancement in all that goes to make men happy and virtuous. One striking distinction between the exposition to be held at Columbus and the one being held at Cincinnati is that at the former there will be a large and striking exhibit of the productions of agriculture in the Northwest, showing the great progress in all of those things which partake in or result from our success in this pursuit of man.

Within a brief period after the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia the style of architecture in the whole East began materially to change, and the interior decorations and the furnishings of our homes grew more attractive and comfortable—a slight illustration of the influence of such celebrations as educators. But the time is limited and the business of the House pressing. I therefore move the previous question upon the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to appeal to the gentleman. I have offered an amendment with the view, of course, that it shall be pending. With that understanding I shall not antagonize the previous question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Of course, as the other gentlemen who have offered amendments have not withdrawn them, I am willing the gentleman should stand upon the same footing, and now I move the previous question upon the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CANNON. There are three amendments pending, including that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER. My amendment is considered as pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understood.

The question recurs on the first amendment, offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], which will be read.

The amendment was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 19.

So Mr. WISE's amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is no necessity of again reading the amendment, which is a long one, as it has been read already this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 50.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. WARNER'S amendment; which was read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 38.

So the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let us have the bill read as it has been amended. I do not suppose any human being knows just what it is as it has been amended. I do not care about the entire text of the bill being read, but let the amendments be read to see just what they are.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It will save time to have only the amendments read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments come in at the end of the bill. Does the gentleman insist on the whole bill being read?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; let the amendments be read.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If it is a matter of indifference with my friend and no consideration what the bill provides or that the House should understand what it contains, of course I shall not insist upon the reading of the whole bill.

Mr. ROGERS. It has been read already.

Mr. HERBERT. I insist on the reading of the amendments at least.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill; and the gentleman is entitled to have the bill read if he insists upon it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendments which had been adopted.

Mr. HERBERT. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. OUTHWAITE demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 66.

Mr. ROGERS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 49 voting in favor thereof—which was more than one-fifth of those present.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 90, not voting 166; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If no quorum votes on this question will it be in order to immediately call the roll again?

The SPEAKER. It will not, except by unanimous consent. The roll has been called as often as the rule permits.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then what will be the condition——

Mr. LONG. Will it be in order to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the names of the absentees be again called.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I object.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House concurrent resolution to print 100,000 copies of the tariff law and amendments proposed by the Mills bill has been considered by the Committee on Finance, and the committee agree unanimously that it is better to print the document in the form proposed and according to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing of the Senate now rather than to postpone it until the Senate scheme in some form or other is presented. The members of the House are anxious to have the document printed, and the Committee on Finance recommend that the resolution be passed as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out, in the last line of the resolution, after "printed," the words "for the use of the House" and insert "75,000 for the use of the House and 25,000 for the use of the Senate;" so as to make the resolution read:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBLEY D. EVANS AND RICHARD M. GREEN.

Mr. BECK. I hope we shall proceed with the Calendar now.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the Calendar now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first order of business on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be stated.

The bill (S. 995) for the relief of Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green $4,000, in payment in full of all demands for the past and future use by the Government of the United States of their patented invention for bending metal links in the manufacture of cable and other chain, and for which letters patent were issued to them on the 4th of April, 1882.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not see that there is any report in this case. I should like to know who those patentees are, and what kind of a patent it was, and whether they were in the employment of the Government of the United States and receiving a salary at the time the invention was patented?

Mr. PLATT. I did not make a formal report in this case, because I believe a similar bill has twice before passed the Senate, once certainly. There was a formal report in the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, Report No. 673.

It is true that Robley D. Evans and Richard M. Green were in the employment of the Government at the time the machine was put in use. Mr. Evans was equipment officer in charge of the equipment division of the Washington navy-yard. Mr. Green was foreman in the chain and smith shop. It is also true that the Government time, material, and facilities were used by the patentees in constructing the invention. It is equally true that the invention under the law belongs to these parties, and that except by their consent the United States can not use it.

The bill which was originally referred to the committee last year provided for the payment of $40,000. The Committee on Patents communicated with the Secretary of the Navy as to his opinion on the subject. The matter was referred by the Acting Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Schley, Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, who reported that it was a useful invention; that the Government needed it, and that he thought $5,000 would be a fair compensation for the past and future use.

There was also a recommendation from George C. Remey, captain United States Navy; J. H. Sands, commander United States Navy, and D. P. McCartney, chief engineer United States Navy. They united in the same view as to the necessity of the Government using it, and thought that $315.45 for the past would be sufficient, and $2,500 for the future use of the machine.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much for the past use?

Mr. PLATT. Three hundred and fifteen dollars and forty-five cents. There was a period when the Government used it for nothing. They thought $315.45 would be sufficient for the time the Government used it when there was no agreement that they should have the use of it free. When Commodore Casey became equipment officer he had some arrangement with the patentees that the machine should be used for a time free of expense.

Mr. COCKRELL. How much would those two sums make?

Mr. PLATT. They would make $2,815.45, but Commodore Schley, chief of the bureau, recommending $5,000 the committee, on the whole, agreed to put the sum at $4,000. The matter was discussed and explained at considerable length in the Senate at the last Congress, and I believe the bill was finally passed without division at that sum.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the invention?

Mr. PLATT. The invention is a machine for bending metal links to make heavy chains or cables.

As I say, the report is a formal matter, the Senate having formerly fully discussed the subject and acted upon it. Otherwise I should have presented a written report at this session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire simply to state that I repudiate the idea that a man in the service of the Government, receiving a full equivalent for all his services, and using the material of the Government, and working within the hours in which he is required to work for the Government, can patent an invention and claim anything from the United States for it.

Mr. PLATT. The difficulty about that is that the Supreme Court of the United States, having had that exact question under consideration, decided otherwise; that the patent belonged to the individual who was in the Government employ. Whatever may be said about the justice, the equity, and the right of it, the law is so that the patent belongs to him.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can change the law.

Mr. PLATT. We can by statute.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can change the law. We make the law. I say it is an unjust law that will grant it; and I say if it is the law, let these parties go to the Court of Claims and assert their rights there if they have legal rights.

It is a monstrous proposition that all the employés of the Government must stop the faculties of their mind and refuse to think and be driven along in grooves because if they do think and try to do their business well and to improve the Government service they may get a patent, and will then come in and claim that the Government must remunerate them for the very service they have been performing, for which they have already been paid.

I understand exactly the position of the Senator from Connecticut in regard to the mere technical legal right. I admit that. I admit the court has so decided under existing law; but I say the law ought to be modified. There ought to be a change, and it strikes me that this bill presents a most favorable opportunity for putting in an additional section changing the law. Therefore I move, as an additional section, and if the amendment is adopted I shall move then to amend the title to make it correspond:

SEC. 2. And that hereafter——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator forward his amendment in writing to the desk?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will let the bill go over until I can prepare an amendment. Let it be passed over until to-morrow without losing its place, and I will prepare an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Before the bill passes from the consideration of the Senate I wish to say a few words.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will withdraw my objection so that the Senator from Connecticut may make a remark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the consideration of bills under Rule VIII a Senator can speak but once.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say that I do not desire to precipitate now a discussion upon the question which has been raised by the Senator from Missouri. There is a great deal that can be said in favor of protecting to the inventor who is in the service of the Government or in the service of an individual an invention which he makes under such circumstances; but that question can not be discussed this morning under the five-minute rule. If the Senator insists upon proposing his amendment the bill can hardly be considered under this rule. Whenever that question shall come up I shall take occasion to differ essentially from the proposition of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GEORGE. Before we pass from this patent question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi can proceed by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill is still pending. I withdrew my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdrew my objection to allow the Senator from Connecticut to make a remark.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make a statement and an inquiry. Very early in the session I introduced in the Senate a bill for the purpose of protecting innocent purchasers, bona fide purchasers, for value, in open market, of patented articles. The bill was referred to the Committee on Patents some four or five months ago. I had assurances from some members of that committee that there would be an early report upon the bill. Up to this time the committee has made no report. I desire to inquire of the chairman of that committee when the Senate may expect a report upon that bill, so that the matter of the bill can be brought before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. The chairman of the Committee on Patents [Mr. TELLER] has been called away for this week and is not here to respond. I will say, however, that perhaps the Senator from Mississippi has reason to make the inquiry, and he has perhaps just ground for complaint. Yet the subject of the bill has been a matter of several discussions in the Committee on Patents, and I promised the committee that I would endeavor to present a bill which embraced my views upon the general subject, but the condition of my health and other business have caused a delay on my part. If there is any fault it is mine. The committee has been anxious to report the bill, and it will be reported during the present session in some form.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to say that I do not wish to impute any negligence to any member of the committee or any wish upon their part to suppress discussion and investigation of the subject. It is a matter to which I have given a good deal of consideration. I believe the law as it now stands is one of very great wrong and hardship to the people of this country, and I am very anxious that the Senate, after full debate and consideration, shall vote upon the subject. I am gratified to know from the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut that the matter of the consideration and report of the bill will not be much longer delayed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I ask that the bill go over until I can have an opportunity to confer with the Senator from Connecticut in regard to the matter, the bill retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, and the next order of business on the Calendar will be announced.

CEDAR RIVER POINT LIGHT.

The bill (S. 3229) to establish a light at or near Cedar River Point, at the mouth of Cedar River, Green Bay, Michigan, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask that that bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

FRONTIER GUARDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1019) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to place on file in the War Department the names of the officers and members of the Frontier Guards, mustered into the volunteer military service of the United States on the 18th day of April, 1861, and issue discharges to the same; which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. PLATT. Is the report long? If not, I should like to hear it read.

Mr. STEWART. The bill had better be read first.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read as proposed to be amended, and then the report.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet been read at length as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read and afterwards the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated.

The amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs were, in line 7, before the word "day," to strike out "eighteenth" and insert "sixteenth;" and in line 9, after the word "discharges," to strike out:

To the same; said discharges to be the same in form and language as those issued at that time by James H. Lane, captain of said organization, as he was authorized to do by the then Secretary of War.

And insert:

To such of them as shall furnish satisfactory proof by affidavits of comrades or officers of said organization that they rendered military service and were honorably discharged; said discharges shall be in the form and language used by James H. Lane, captain of said Frontier Guards, in issuing discharges therefrom: Provided, That none of said officers or men shall be entitled to pay or allowance or bounty or pension by reason of service in such guards.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the files of the War Department the names of the officers and men of an organization known as the Frontier Guards, regularly mustered into the volunteer military service of the United States on the 16th day of April, 1861, and issue discharges to such of them as shall furnish satisfactory proof by affidavits of comrades or officers of said organization that they rendered military service and were honorably discharged; said discharges shall be in the form and language used by James H. Lane, captain of said Frontier Guards, in issuing discharges therefrom: Provided, That none of said officers or men shall be entitled to pay or allowance or bounty or pension by reason of service in such guards.

Mr. PLATT. I do not ask for the reading of the report. The bill explains itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other amendment, if there be no objection, will be agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to place on file in the War Department the names of the officers and members of the Frontier Guards, mustered into the volunteer military service of the United States on the 16th day of April, 1861, and issue discharges to the same."

ACCOUNTS WITH STATES.

The bill (S. 2430) explanatory of an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that bill had better be laid over. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who reported it, is not present, and I think it had better not lose its place, but just retain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There should be a verbal amendment in line 6 of the bill, in any event, where it reads:

Shall, and is hereby, declared, etc.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps the reading of the report will explain the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire to have the bill passed over without prejudice?

Mr. COCKRELL. I merely suggested that, because the reading of the report in all probability may cause some objection, and so it would be a waste of time.

There is only one point that did not strike me when the bill was considered in committee. That is in regard to the Indian reservations. I see that it gives to all the States here named indemnity in lieu of the Indian reservations now existing. The original act, as I see from the report, only gave indemnity where the reservations became public property and belonged to the United States, and the Indians were removed. Now, it is a serious question, in some of the Territories, at least, as to whether we shall give them an indemnity for an immense area of Indian reservation that may remain an Indian reservation for all time to come.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Missouri to ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it would be better under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over. The next order of business will be stated.

GEORGETOWN AND TENNALLYTOWN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (H. R. 7647) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM RAILROADS IN THE DISTRICT.

The next business on the Calendar was Order of Business 1727, being the motion of Mr. MORRILL to commit bills S. 2916 and S. 2615 to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This order of business is improperly on the Calendar at this place, and will be passed over and follow the bills when they are reached on the Calendar.

Mr. EVARTS. I give notice that after the final disposition of the next bill in order on the Calendar, I shall ask leave to go into open executive session for the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution:

Ordered, That Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi, Mr. CUTCHEON of Michigan, Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois, Mr. COX of New York, Mr. GROSVENOR of Ohio, and Mr. MCSHANE of Nebraska be the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of General Philip H. Sheridan, and cooperate with the committee on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1508) to relieve certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion; and

A bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

NANCY G. ALEXANDER.

The bill (H. R. 6233) for the relief of Nancy G. Alexander was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Nancy G. Alexander, of Cumberland County, Kentucky, of $250 for coal taken from her by officers of the United States Navy and used on gunboats on the Cumberland River, during the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUES OF RICHARD STOCKTON AND PHILIP KEARNY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the governor of the State of New Jersey; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Trenton, July 25, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, in response to the invitation of Congress to each of the States "to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, of two distinguished persons who have been citizens thereof, and illustrious for their historic renown, or from distinguished civil or military services," to be placed in the old hall of the House of Representatives in the Capitol of the United States, the State of New Jersey has furnished a marble statue of Richard Stockton, member of the Continental Congress from New Jersey, and a signer of the Declaration of Independence, eminent as a jurist, a patriot, and a statesman; and a bronze statue of Philip Kearny, captain and major of dragoons in the war with Mexico, and major-general in the United States volunteer army, who, distinguished in two continents for his conspicuous bravery and military accomplishments, lost his life in the service of his country at Chantilly, Va., September 1, 1862.

These statues, now in the National Statuary Hall in the Capitol, are herewith presented to the Congress of the United States by the State of New Jersey, as her contribution to the collection of statues of illustrious Americans.

Very respectfully,

ROBT. S. GREEN,
Governor of New Jersey.

Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS,
President of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In answer to the communication just read from the governor of New Jersey, I desire to offer a concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the thanks of Congress be presented to the governor and through him to the people of New Jersey for the statues of Richard Stockton and Philip Kearny, whose names are so honorably identified with the history of the State and of the United States.

Resolved, That these works of art are accepted in the name of the nation, and assigned places in the old hall of the House of Representatives already set aside by act of Congress for statues of eminent citizens, and that a copy of this resolution signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be transmitted to the governor of New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I now move that the communication received from the governor of New Jersey, and also the resolution offered by me, be printed and lie upon the table, and I desire to give notice that I will ask for the consideration of the resolution on the 21st day of August, at some time during the day.

The motion to print was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. EVARTS. I now make my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with if there be no objection. The treaty will be reported by title.

The EXECUTIVE CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the treaty until the Wednesday after the first Monday in December next.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, under ordinary circumstances, governing the consideration of any weighty matter before the Senate, I might wish that during this period of excessive heat (which we hope may not be very protracted), we might have been excused from any elaborate discussion or any wearisome attention. After so long and prolonged a debate on both sides, so amply illustrated, so amply stated in the speeches of the eminent Senators on both sides, it is of great importance that we should bring our deliberations to a close. I must, therefore, undertake perhaps to overtask my own strength, as I shall certainly the indulgence of the Senate, in undertaking a discussion, now, of what seem to me the important elements that are to determine whether this treaty is suitable for adoption.

I have not been inattentive to the course of the debate, and I shall not attempt, as I do not need to attempt, any repetition of the topics of consideration that have, under the somewhat wide discussion, invited the attention of the Senate and perhaps have enlivened the debate. So, too, upon some of the direct and intimate considerations that strictly belong to the debate I shall find, as one Senator after another upon this side and one after another upon the other side has, in his ample and complete discussion, sufficiently occupied and sufficiently explored this and that province of the wide area of debate which this treaty opens for its exhaustive treatment.

I shall first attempt to dispose of some preliminary considerations very briefly and then to take up the situation between the two countries in regard to the matters in controversy now and heretofore had in debate, up to the time when the present Administration undertook the negotiation of this treaty. I shall then propose to consider the attitude and precise situation of the two countries towards this—I will not say renewed negotiation, but towards this fresh initiation of an attempt at a formal treaty on the subject of the fisheries between Great Britain and the United States. I may thus expect to show how in the frame and substance, the purpose and the aim of this treaty, it is, as I think, wholly incongruous with the just position of this Government in the debates hitherto had between the two countries up to the present time, and the true attitude in the future to be maintained by us towards Great Britain.

The function imparted to the Senate in the confirmation or rejection of treaties stands upon a basis for its deliberation and for its decision quite separate from all the functions that concern the initiation or the execution of political, of legislative power. It is provided in the Constitution that the advice and consent of the Senate, at whatever stages it is to be given in regard to the consummation of a treaty, the majority necessary to convey the concurrence of the Senate in the action of the Executive must be expressed by a two-thirds vote. It will be observed that, however great, however momentous, howsoever long enduring in its consequences may be political action and legislative action, the supreme will of this people as reposed in the two Houses of Congress is satisfied to take the results of debates and of votes as shown by a simple majority.

They recognize and appreciate the fact that whatever thus may be decided by a majority may be reconsidered and reversed or annulled by the same mere majority, and at any time, in any political action that has been taken by the two Houses. In regard, however, to the great Senatorial function now under view the frame of our Government has insisted upon this departure from the general rule of the majority, as with a certain aversion to engagements with foreign powers, and especially an aversion to such engagements in respect of their permanence and our inability to reconsider, or review, or amend such engagements at our own independent will. As in the jurisdiction of impeachment, that the two-thirds majority for conviction should have such guaranties as are possible, that there should not enter into it (perhaps that might not be anticipated as possible) any predominance either of the relations of a political majority in the Senate or of a political adhesion to the Chief Magistrate and the executive councils that control and direct him. For these two reasons presumptively when we enter upon a discussion, either in secret session or now in open debate, we enter under a peremptory and inexorable condition of the Constitution under the wisdom of its framers, that herein the line of political majority in the Chamber itself, or the line of political adhesion to the Executive, has no place. It is quite true that in the progress of affairs there may come to be so great a preponderance in favor of one party, so great a preponderance of those who adhere to the counsels and interests and feelings and desires of the Executive, that this provision of the Constitution shall prove impotent; but that is owing to no lack of wisdom on the part of the framers of this Constitution nor of the rigorous exaction from us. That misfortune I have now noticed, if it should ever overtake us, is not a reason that, because it may prove inoperative, this restraint should not have been imposed upon us.

It is of great importance—without reference, now, to any adhesion between Senators in their political affiliations with the Executive that now or at any time may be in power—in a case where the Senators themselves by their own sympathies, their doctrines, their opinions, their sense of patriotism, alone bring about a concurrence of wish and purpose in a majority, to wit, a political majority, where the Constitution has intended to avert such a result, because the treaty when made is so permanent and no longer subject to the fluctuations of political opinion or political majorities.

We find in conceding to majorities, and their predominant authority over minorities, some certain assurance that if a result is pressed beyond patriotism, and is in execution of party wish and feeling, then political agitations can correct it; then the people themselves will give renewed authority and confidence to the power that has executed this authority in legislation, or they will withdraw it and invest an opposite opinion and an opposite action with the power of supplanting, subordinating, and controlling opposing interests and feelings. But when a treaty has been ratified all changes of public opinion, all changes of political majorities, all changes of executive power, all rearrangements in this assembly, all rearrangements in the House of Representatives, go for nothing. The country as a whole, as a political power and entity, and now as a great power among the nations indisputably, is held and bound so that the internal arrangements, its changeable opinion, all that enter the mutations of politics are inoperative and the treaty remains unchangeable except as change shall come from the conceded concurrence of a foreign power, or, resisting what becomes intolerable, the two Houses of Congress make a denunciation and an abrogation of the treaty.

We therefore, Mr. President, have a right to expect when we come to a discussion of a treaty that on both sides of the Chamber we place ourselves upon the constitutional basis and necessities that should govern the deliberation and action of the Senate.

But when we come to a further and more intimate consideration of whether the power and independence and intrepidity of the Senate in regard to the concurrence with Executive power in making a treaty is to be overborne, not by the concurrent opinions that have originated and advised and approved, but under opinions now to be brought forward, changing the attitudes of Senators when no change in facts has happened to justify politically a change—I mean political in the sense of the policy of the United States—and when nothing has occurred in regard to the reason or the wisdom of the proposed changed attitude of the Senate, but all that has happened is that the just independence of the Executive in maintaining negotiations, in bringing them to a result, in engaging the people of the United States and its Government towards the foreign power, by the whole Executive power; and when the consultation of the Senate and its concurrence are invited, it is found that the attitude takes the shape merely of party cohesion and of party enlistment—it is not for me to say against reason or against patriotism, but that apparently a governing and a weighty consideration is introduced into the debate, to wit, whether or not the policy of the Executive shall be adopted and approved by the Senate or shall be rejected by it, and then the votes are to be accordingly clustered, it is said, in support of the President's policy. And this is to come about not upon any views originating in the body of the Senate, or in the opinions of the people, or in the opinions of the two Houses of Congress, but wholly upon the political act and fact that the Executive has committed itself to a certain treaty.

Whatever may be the influences—let us suppose wise and just—that have brought about a reconsideration, so that the will of the Executive seems to be the best and wisest expression of the Senate's desire and approval and of the needs and occasions of this great people, it can not be denied that, whereas two years ago there was neither voice raised nor knee bent throughout all the wide region of this country urging any new treaty of any kind, and when the topic was suggested by the Executive as one proper to be initiated, then what we must consider as a unanimous concurrence of the two Houses in its political action, in its law-making power, was pronounced against that line and that method of dealing with the situation between this country and Great Britain, I must think that either there has been a sudden conversion of opinions or there has been an adoption of some overwhelming consideration of the welfare of the country wholly outside of the value and of the mere interests that are limited to the fisheries themselves.

The next question that has been raised here is that it is not right for the opponents of this treaty to put the issue of its adoption or its rejection as a separate and naked proposition, but that, under the power of advising and consenting, it is the duty of the Senate to give its aid in bettering, in modifying, in amending a faulty treaty, as it would thus be regarded, in order that it may be seen and known what ought or might be the future action of the Executive.

Mr. President, it is undoubtedly true that though the apparent power of the Senate is strictly limited, as in the confirmation to office, either to rejection or confirmation, advising and consenting without any liberty of encroaching either upon the freedom of appointments to office in the one case, or, in the other case, upon the freedom in negotiation in regard to the whole subject opened between the two countries after a treaty is perfected, yet there has come to be a habit of the Senate, going perhaps further in some cases than is suitable, in undertaking to take hold of a treaty, and by improving or adding to it, making it a better interpretation or a fuller expression of the intention or purpose of the treaty.

But I submit to every candid mind that when all amendments that should undertake to meet the question of the rejection or opposition to the adoption of a treaty turn upon the substance and spirit and mode of treatment, appertaining not to the very provisions, but to the acceptance of that method for this nation, entering upon and disposing of open questions with a foreign nation, it would be unfair, ungenerous, unsuitable to the dignity of the Senate, and discreditable to the opponents of the treaty, thus under the guise of rejecting the purpose and plan of the Executive Government submitted to us, by turning it wrong side out and sending it to the President as a new trouble and a new difficulty and a new proposition for him in the future negotiations between him and Great Britain, if he chooses to pursue the subject, as he may, under a notice, under an embarrassment to this Executive, and under a notice to the foreign government that this or that must be the reversal of this treaty or it never can show its face, unless, under some excessive adherence to the Executive will, it is attempted again to send back the treaty.

No, Mr. President, it is vain to say that the opposition to this treaty is such as to require of us to amend or improve it. If that province could be entered upon it would be found that the treaty in its provisions would need to read, so to speak, backwards from what it reads in its provisions now. It would not be a change of this or that purpose, of this or that clause or article, but that the treatment between us and Great Britain of whatever needs adjustment and of whatever should require benevolent attention on both sides of the international inquiry, is entirely different in principle from undertaking merely to cut and carve out rights and to limit and to distribute the degree of equality that we shall have in regard to the other subjects in the treaty than the fisheries themselves.

There is another general consideration here that is pressed upon us in various forms. I hardly know how to treat it with seriousness, and yet it ought not to be passed over. That is, whether we are under a freedom of debate here so that we can dispose of this treaty and its articles upon their merit, or whether the question of rejection and adoption is not so much upon the merits as upon the consequences that would follow from a rejection.

Now, I understand in various quarters, on this floor and in public expressions, that a legitimate, or if not a legitimate, yet a natural and probable result of the rejection of this treaty will be to lead to collisions, umbrage, offenses, retaliations, and wars. Well, Mr. President, if we are sitting as the Roman Senate was when Brennus stood beating against the doors of the senate-house, the freedom of debate would be terminated of course. If it be at all true that we have any trace of any suggestions, I will not say by a prime minister, I will not say by a parliament, I will not say by any minister or any negotiator, that this pressure should be made upon us, I will not say what we should do. My judgment is clear; but I have no occasion to consider that, for I have not heard the breath of a whisper from the United Kingdom or from any of its departments of power and authority that if we should prefer that the treaties now existing should remain, by an omission to substitute a new treaty, that would be a cause of umbrage.

I must say that, so far as this subject goes, perhaps the nearest of anything like a definite statement upon the side of this country is an expression of a meditation, I must call it, of the Secretary of State which has been produced before the country, and remains, I believe, entirely unanswered or disavowed, that when the question was put to the Secretary of State, in an interview I suppose with the Boston fishermen, of what the consequences of this treaty not being adopted would be, the Secretary is announced as saying:

> Then chaos again. We revert to the old quarrel transferred, I fear, by the fruitless effort at conciliation. If we are thrown back upon the condition existing before the commission sat the party that rejects the treaty will be responsible for results. How long should we escape war?

Now, Mr. President, I have no desire to impute to the Secretary of State words or expressions that in spirit or tone are not fairly to be ascribed to him; but that is the nearest that I find on the part of this Government as to its solicitude as to what may happen if this treaty is rejected. On this floor I have heard, in various degrees, argument and declamation suggesting that whoever opposed this treaty, whatever party opposed this treaty will be responsible for whatever results shall come from its rejection, and exposes us to what may be called—fairly enough without increasing the imputation—a natural and hostile retaliation and a resort to other methods than negotiation on the part of Great Britain.

But, Mr. President, I have not observed that this tone has affected the judgment upon either side of this Chamber on this topic. I have not observed that the public mind has responded to any alarm of this kind. For aught I can see men are engaged about their merchandise and their farming and all their interests without allowing themselves to be disturbed, even to the division of a hair, as to their security and their reliance upon the power and duty of this nation in preserving its dignity and maintaining its peace.

A temporary suggestion intervened, of which I have not heard so much lately, and that is, if this treaty is rejected and the retaliatory powers conferred, or as in the observations I made in 1886 in debating the bill, the responsive provision of that legislation is resorted to if this treaty be rejected, and that power in the hands of the President should then, at his option, be called out, that he will exert his authority against the interests and the prosperity of this country, so extensive, so numerous, so delicate if you please, as will, if not coerced, at least punish the people who have intrusted this great power to the President. Sir, this aspersion of the Executive, this intimation is so unjust, so wholly unsuitable to any of the relations between the various departments of this Government that I must await some demonstration or some acceptance of it on the part of the executive government by an espousal or adoption of that proposition. If it amounts to anything it amounts to an announcement that this power intrusted to the President for the welfare of the people shall be used against this nation and against the people in it.

It is equivalent to saying that the little finger of the Executive shall be thicker than the loins of the provincial parliaments or of the Parliament of England; that this power in his hands shall whip us with scorpions until agitations, and necessary agitations, in this country about their interests shall provoke either a submission, as some might expect, or rather, as I should anticipate, a resistance—an overwhelming resistance to any such exercise of power.

But there is another intimation of a power, not as extensive as that of the British Crown nor as the great function and power of the President of the United States, but the power of the Democratic party as embodied in its legislative authority as making up the component members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and that is that if this treaty thus proposed as acceptable is not adopted; if this provoking, irritating, and protracted disturbance, as it would be called, between the two nations or between our provincial neighbors and ourselves is not brought to this happy and this peremptory close, then the special interests both of those who gain a livelihood by the fisheries and of the people of the country that are interested in the fisheries, and in the development of them as a national power and means, shall all yield to a majority and their economical opinions of taking away the market from our own fishermen in their protection of it and bestowing it upon the foreign fishermen.

Mr. President, these several forms of suggestion, more or less vague, more or less weighty, seem to me, in any influence they should have upon the vote of any Senator here, wholly imaginary and illusory. Whatever we expose ourselves to from our calm deliberation and our expressed conclusions on the subject of this treaty, we may expect to meet Great Britain with the treaties now in force, and with the rightful exercise and interpretation of those existing treaties, which we are expecting in advance will be conceded by this great and friendly power, or in default of it that, our rights being understood as we interpret them, we will expect a respectful and conciliatory entertainment of them. But that is a long way short of finding no means of adjustment between these two great nations with their hundreds of interests, I will not say of lineage and of blood, but interests moral, religious, and political, in advancing the freedom of the world, in the manifold commercial interests all over the world—that we have no means at command except that of solving this problem by an ultimate resort to force. This, therefore, I must consider, Mr. President, as a line in this triple form of influence wholly unsuited to our dignity and wholly lacking in weight of impression upon us.

Mr. President, the fisheries in debate here are just as large, just as important, just as great and weighty elements of power, of enjoyment, and of influence upon society and the development of the interests of the nation to-day as they were in 1783. Nature has not reduced the value of those fisheries in themselves, nor has the nature of our people changed as to the influences upon men reared and disciplined in the nurture of the fisheries, no change in the courage, in the skill, in the coolness, in the adeptness, in all the occasions that maritime war or maritime adventure shall call upon these fishermen to engage in.

When we look, therefore, at this hydrographical display of that great fishery [pointing to the map], let us understand that nothing has happened to it that itself, in the providence of God or in the nature of man, makes it less important in itself now than it was in 1783. It is quite true that, under the beneficent development of the immense wealth and power and trade and commerce and manufactures of this country, that have grown up under our institutions and under our courage of defending our institutions and maintaining our rights from 1783 down to this time, this great boon and this great enjoyment have become now relatively less in comparison with the mass of our wealth and diversity of our interests. But we did not get to what we now reach and possess by abandoning or undervaluing or ridiculing this great benefit and this great possession and this great influence in our affairs.

We took it as ours and obtained the recognition of our rights, and from that moment down until now it has never become the mouth of an American to make fun of the fishermen or belittle the fisheries. It never has become the mouth of a British minister or a British Parliament or a British foreign secretary to undervalue either the character of the fishermen or the value of the fisheries, nor has it become a French minister, with its fishery so much less important than our own, with all its European power, with all its European relations, with all its pride in arms and all its excitable and brilliant imagination, nobody in France has ever made fun of the fishermen or undervalued the fisheries, and no French minister in any negotiation with Great Britain has lowered the power or the demands of France for its proper share according to its rights.

I submit that in the course of our debates at any critical periods in our relations with Great Britain concerning these treaty rights this fishery possession never before has—either the interest of this country in the fishermen or in their deserts toward their country, never in regard to the possession itself and the value, the importance, the necessity of its preservation—been a disputed topic in a debate; but all these were assumed and exulted in. All through, however, this present debate on the other side of this Chamber—I do not wish to press the point too far—it has seemed to me that there has been evinced not so much a compulsion of conscientious duty to espouse the British side as a great pleasure and delight in thus espousing it. It has seemed to me, Mr. President, that this debate throughout on the other side of the Chamber has been redolent with the odor of denationality rather than nationality.

What, then, is this unhappy situation we are in? Is it true that our enemies are in our own household? Is it true that arguments, illustrations, rhetoric that would not have been whispered above a breath in any British Parliament or any Dominion Parliament are here easily slipped from the tongue and easily rolled as a pleasant morsel under the tongue?

I submit, Mr. President, that the most noticeable circumstance in regard to this debate is this attitude of the Democratic party, of the looseness of their adhesion in affection, in zeal, in sympathy, that we conceive belongs to all Americans when they are dealing with a foreign power, and when besides I see what the present constitution of the Democratic party as represented in the two Houses of Congress shows a geographical division as well as a division of political affiliations, it appears to me that this fact is what will most attract the attention of the people of this country and will most attract the attention of the foreign nation, Great Britain. It will not, however, alarm the people of this country; and it will not deceive the people of Great Britain. The people of Great Britain know perfectly well that when the patriotism of the American people is touched, then there is but one response from the hearts of the people at large. Whatever obscurations, whatever perturbations shall have affected individual adhesions or party necessities, when the people in their primary capacity are judging between England and the United States they will judge for the United States and not argue for the British side.

Mr. President, I have spoken of these fisheries in their natural condition. They are the greatest fisheries in the world. They were a subject of pride and of covetousness between the great powers of Europe before this independent nation came into existence. It was not unworthy the notice of Great Britain and of France and of Spain (and Spain at that time was a great power, greater than any other power except France and England)—it was not too small a subject to be made an occasion of desire and of inquiry when settling the basis of our independence, that these great powers should wish to deprive us of all participation in them. England in the end was induced, when we insisted on our independence, that our territories should be recognized as extensive as our demand, to consent that on the sea, and in this nursery of the sea, and in our preparation for possession of the sea, this great adjacent school for fishermen and school for seamen and school for shipmasters and naval officers, should be secured to the claim and possession of our Government. A deliberate desire was exhibited to exclude us; it was plotted for; it was resisted by the negotiators of America. They knew then what this fishery was. They had no imagination of what the greatness of this nation was to become in a hundred years from that date, but they knew that it was independent, that at last it was launched upon the stormy sea of human affairs, and it meant to grow and it meant to command every range and reach in which it should need to grow, and thus should match in all the competitions with great nations in the race for wealth and power. Though the insight and the far-sighted wisdom of Adams may have first and most firmly insisted that with and as a part of our independence there should be incorporated in our national frame this fishery right, that no persuasion, no postponement, no prevarications, should permit for a moment even any separation of this property in the fisheries from independence itself, and from our title to our territory, the other negotiators were scarcely behind in sagacity and patriotism. Laurens was of the same firm view. John Jay said in words that if this fishery right was not included in the preliminary terms of peace and in the definitive arrangement "it would not be a treaty, but an insidious truce." Indeed, there is no doubt if this object of desire and of competition had been left out, to our injury, and to the calculation and to the intrigue of these great powers, how long would it have been before the same attitude would have been taken about the fisheries that was taken about the postponement of the delivery of the outposts of the western country?

Are we, then, ready to say as to these fisheries thus measured in their national boundaries, 900 leagues from the coast of Great Britain—are we ready to say now that it is a matter of debate what is proper treatment for the preservation of these fisheries to this country, and that our enjoyment of them is less important to us as toward foreign nations? Are we to say that patriotism has declined, so that everything now is local, that the very work that has been prognosticated by evil eyes for its necessary operation in the distribution of power and the distribution of interests in our system of government should end in our people taking no common interest for the general welfare, but only for particular interests of particular sections? Are the fishermen to be counted in their numbers and the fisheries in their product? Are we to suppose that if we have through untoward influences been swept from the ocean in our foreign commerce (though our domestic commerce and coastwise commerce now are so vast) we shall leave the last opportunity of keeping alive the fisheries and our naval power? It must indeed, Mr. President, be a confession of this if we are to follow the indications that are presented to us on the other side of the Chamber.

If it be true that we do not value the fisheries; if it be true that we do not value their maintenance; if it be true that we do not care for preserving our historic claims that we have never yet abandoned, then let it openly be a matter of merchandise and sell it for what it is worth—a large subject of transfer if we are ready to part with it. But we are not ready to part with it, to tear off and reduce it, and expose it to all the irritating influences that belong to the occupation of the coast, to find only some paltry recompense not of added benefit to our fisheries, but of diminution, as well, of what we claim of our rights and interests outside of the fisheries.

Now, who are the owners of these fisheries? Certainly not the Provinces; certainly not the State of Maine and the State of Massachusetts. They are the property of the United States of America and of the United Kingdom, and they have so remained from the treaty of 1783 till now, subject only to disposition and control by action between those powers by treaty and not by law. When we have made a treaty as between nations, can laws, either imperial or provincial, diminish our rights or encroach upon our enjoyment?

No publicist, no public man has ever denied that when encroachments in fact or by legislation overreach our possession and impair our enjoyment of it, the authority for it must be found in some stipulation that we have signed. It must be hidden, it must lurk under the terms of the treaty of 1783 or in the treaty of 1818, because by absorption by the shore population or by usurpation of imperial power our share can not be taken away but by our signature. We acquired the natural fisheries as they stood then, and with the power that then made their partition with us as a part of our independence, and from that time to this I challenge it as an inquiry and debate that our powers and our enjoyment are to be treated always as they stood in their original propositions and in their original enjoyment until the signature of the United States can be shown to something in derogation or diminution either of the range of the fisheries or of the method and degree of our enjoyment of them.

What, then, have been the dealings of the United States and of the United Kingdom on the subject of the fisheries? They date from the treaty of 1783, and as rapidly as possible I shall endeavor to present what I regard as the true treatment of this subject hitherto between the two governments.

The treaty of 1783 is a very simple, a very intelligent treaty. It is one of those treaties that do not need to be interpreted. All logicians, as well as forensic reasoners, demand that when a text does not need to be interpreted it shall not be interpreted away. One must find in its own elements something to demand interpretation that is left undisposed of or else incomplete or ambiguous in expression. The treaty of 1783 is a very simple treaty.

It is agreed that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy—

That is not a concession, it is a statement of fact, that when we became independent the part of our independence which belonged to us in this enjoyment belonged to us by right.

Shall continue to enjoy unmolested.

"Unmolested" is a large word. The framers of the treaty knew what it meant. They did not need to enlarge upon it. It meant that we should have it without let or hindrance, and without any molestation after the separation between the governments. That is what that great word means. You may enlarge upon it as long as you please, you can not make a better word, and you can not more definitely draw the line between two great nations when they use that word, that when one is confronted with "molestation" it is a violation of the treaty.

Each aggrieved power is the judge of what molestation is, and the parties do not alter the treaty until after the question of molestation is determined. It is, like other differences that may arise, to be disposed of. We say and you agree that we are not to be molested; but we say this is molestation; that it is an encroachment with a purpose of diminishing our fisheries and enlarging your own; it is a purpose of diminishing the fruits, the opportunities, the largeness and freedom of our enjoyment under that one word "unmolested," and we will not endure molestation. We will not cut and carve with you as to how many fishermen are molested, how many voyages are defeated, how much our market is defrauded. We want no molestation. We use it on our side without molestation to you, and you must use it on your side without molestation to us.

I insist upon the view that I take of the subsisting treaty arrangement between Great Britain and the United States, that the treaty of 1783 is in force and is only subject to such reduction and modification in point of substance and in point of duration as was made by the treaty of 1818. It is a deliberate and well-considered enlargement as to the freedom of our fisheries that they shall not be molested, and is still subsisting.

To enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; also in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore fish.

This substantially relates to what is called the deep-sea fishing, for a subsequent clause takes up under a new form or phrase of "liberty" an enlargement of what is thus before treated as matter of right. But it must be considered that this deep-sea fishery, which has not been curtailed by the treaty of 1818 and now subsists by the confession of public authorities, was determined on the part of Great Britain as to be still in force, still unrepealed by the war of 1812.

I ask your attention to our right to have this deep-sea fishery reserved unmolested. I shall hereafter point out what a fishery means, and what molestation or freedom or security from molestation means; but whatever belongs to the enjoyment of this fishery as a fishery in these regions belongs to us to be unmolested.

Now I come to what is spoken of as a question of liberty in the treaty of 1783:

And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use (but not to dry or cure the same on that island), and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

Then comes the right to dry and cure:

And that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but as soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

What was the durability of those provisions? Were any of them subject to curtailment by parliamentary legislation, by provincial legislation, by custom, by interest of the shore population? There was no possibility of it. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. What was the possibility—for there was an element of limitation to "unsettled coasts," where we had the right to cure and dry? What was to happen to us when these coasts became settled? Was our right excluded? Was the progress of settlement to reduce our enjoyment? Was municipal regulation, domestic policy, the interest of the settlements, to interfere with our rights? No, all the curtailment and diminution that came upon our thus stipulated enjoyment by the progress of population was that we must then treat it as settled in private proprietorship, as meum et tuum, between man and man, not that we were excluded from the populated region by treaty or by law, but by stipulation in our own treaty thus to be regulated, that when population spreads we would recognize private property and ownership, and that we could not engage in drying and curing, on their grounds, without an agreement with the private owners.

What more distinct and powerful statement can you have of the permanent condition, unrestrained by imperial or provincial legislation, than that our powers were not to be encroached upon by public authority, but that within the present range, that is now a possibility, the individual owners that take possession shall have the ordinary right of making bargains for the possession and enjoyment of their own lands?

The whole critical exposition of any of the phrases either in 1818 or in 1783 is of the phrases that are used here. The same words in the several treaties mean the same thing.

Now, what was our "right" or our "liberty?" It was—

To take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use.

Here comes in this peccant preposition "on:"

And also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

Does the phrase "on bays" mean outside of a line drawn across the headlands of a bay? Here, originally and wholly undisputed, you have an elliptical expression, if you please, under which lurks a doubt not for that treaty but for the same phrases in other treaties. When, therefore, it is said "on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use," it may have been a discrimination between those and the French fishermen.

And also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America.

When we come to going ashore then this phrase is used:

And that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks.

That means that what was in the shore possession and shore enjoyment in all these bays, creeks, and harbors we should have this right so long as these appurtenances of the land, these inclusions of the sea, shall remain unsettled on shore.

We have therefore here an absolute, an admitted right to fish up to the shore-line. How do we get it? We get it under a liberty given to us to fish on the coasts, bays, and creeks, not using the word "in" or "inside them" at all. It, then, is a necessary provision, ex abundanti cautela, that when you come to a description of these shores you are to exclude a conclusion or pretension that "coast" stops with the opening of a bay, or stops even with the opening of a creek, or stops with the opening of a harbor, but that the coast-line follows from the trend of the coast into all its bays, harbors, and creeks, and our right of fishing is as clear up to the shore-line, inside as outside, and all under the preposition "on."

Does "on a bay," as used in the treaties, mean outside of a line drawn across the sea at the opening of the bay? Unless you can import this meaning into the treaty of 1818 from this brief and elliptical use of the preposition "on" in the treaty of 1783, you have an absolute evidence that the sinuosities are provided for ex abundanti cautela, as included in the coast-line.

In regard to Newfoundland, in the treaty, when no such words of inclusion of bays, etc., are used, have we not a right to go inside the bays of Newfoundland? But our only right there was "on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use." If coast-line is different from and does not include bays, etc., then we had no right on the Newfoundland trend of the coast whenever we came to a bay or other inlet.

But, Mr. President, there was no occasion for insisting upon specific use or distribution of the preposition, as between "on" and "in," under the treaty of 1783, until you come to say where you should have a right to land; that was given in these bays by limitation of them, and was introduced only to show for what purpose it might be done.

In the treaty of 1818 what is the situation and its relation to the treaty of 1783? In 1818 we made another treaty. Up to that time, by the American claim, the treaty of 1783 was in full force. The British claimed that the treaty, made immediately after the war, not having restored any rights of the fisheries, the war itself had abrogated the treaty of 1783. Upon this British pretension we were under need of making a new treaty stipulation in respect of our enjoyment of the fisheries. This British pretension was soon abandoned in regard to what is called the sea fishing, which, it was admitted, was not revocable. It might be said on the part of the British that clause of the treaty of 1783 was only securing to us what by the law of nations we had a right to. At any rate, that treaty remained in force and is now admitted to be in force in reference to the deep-sea fishing. Whether we could rest upon and be satisfied with the law of nations in that regard, the treaty of 1783 still subsists beyond contention as respects the sea fishing proper.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator object to my interrupting him with a question that I may understand him more clearly? I wish to ask the Senator from New York if we are to understand that our right to fish upon the Grand Banks and those other places in the ocean mentioned in the treaty of 1783 is, in his opinion, still dependent upon the concessions or stipulations of that treaty. It may be a misunderstanding on my part.

Mr. EVARTS. It never was dependent upon that. All that was stipulated to us was that, by our independence, we carried with us that right in those fisheries; and if, by the law of nations, now or then, we had no occasion for that stipulation, whatever force or need there is is still left in force in that treaty.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to ask one other question, if the Senator from New York will indulge me. Then, if that be so, is there any ground for the contention that the treaty of 1783 is now operative for any purpose, and is it not so far as being a subsisting convention abrogated, extinguished, and annulled?

Mr. EVARTS. I shall have occasion to show why I attach importance to the preservation of that treaty as now in force, in another aspect, but in this particular aspect there is no occasion for a nation that holds a double title, one of the law of nations and one of a covenanted obligation—when that covenanted obligation is accompanied with the condition in terms that we shall not be molested—giving up either. If we have two titles we do not propose to relinquish either one. If "unmolested" enjoyment was included in the covenant, then we are not driven to a recourse to the rule of the law of nations to determine the line of demarkation between our "unmolested" fisheries and their opportunities and temptations for molestation.

But I might not think it of importance enough for the present situation to insist very much upon this position, except in a certain aspect of what shall happen if the treaty of 1818 should be abrogated.

What did we undertake to do in 1818? There was a contention—let us express it fully—a contention on the part of Great Britain that by the war of 1812 the fishery clause of the treaty of 1783 was annulled, at an end. The contention of the Americans was that it was the partition of empire, and a perpetual agreement, and one of those agreements fundamental and incorporated in the very existence of our independence, incapable of repeal.

However, I shall not quarrel for the moment as to whether this or that contention was sound, or whether in intermediate space was found an agreement. The British gave up the pretension that what was expressed as our "right" was revocable, but hung upon the word "liberty," and that it was not a description of right, but was to be construed between the nations as an interpretation or expression of concession. That we always denied.

What did the negotiators do when they got together? What did they take up? Did they take up the situation as it stood between the nations as if the treaty of 1783 was not in force? It was in force in all respects, except their pretension of its partial abrogation and our counter contention that it was unaffected by the war. How did they take it up? Did they begin by saying, "Whereas the treaty of 1783 has been annulled by the war of 1812, and there are now or may be disputations as to our share in the fishing between the two countries, therefore we will make an original treaty to take the place of it?" Not at all. No negotiator of this country would have signed a treaty with that recital. No negotiator of Great Britain ever pretended to insist as a part of the renewed negotiations on an admission on our part that the treaty had been repealed in any jot or tittle of it by the war of 1812. Did they then take it up as annulled? Let us see. The first article of the treaty of 1818 begins as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen respecting the liberty claimed by the United States for the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, and cure fish.

Of what use were disputes and contentions about a dead treaty? It was of a living treaty, opposite contentions about that treaty, which were to be appeased by undertaking an interpretation and limitation of that right.

What did we gain here? The limitation was upon the text and body of the treaty of 1783 as it stood. "Differences have arisen respecting the liberty" under that treaty. Let it be because we claimed it was in full force and they denied it, but this treats the treaty after its incorporation with the new arrangement as a treaty in subsistence. This is our agreement:

That the inhabitants of the said United States shall have forever.

A dispute had arisen under the treaty of 1783. The word "forever" is not found in that treaty, and we gained the word "forever" to be put in. But I must say that "forever" used in a treaty never outlives the treaty. I have never heard of a posthumous arrangement by which when a treaty was dead one of its provisions survived. However, it is another of those instances where we thought we would have in this provincial meddling about us a word in, so that if it turned on the question whether a subsequent war would affect it or not, this word "forever" would stand in the way.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, and we renounced it "forever."

Mr. EVARTS. I can not speak of all the clauses of the treaty uno et eodem flatu.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. EVARTS. If the Senator will fix his mind on the parts as I am discussing them he will see whether anything is omitted or not.

Mr. GRAY. I am giving the Senator my best attention.

Mr. EVARTS. The treaty of 1818 proceeded:

forever, in common with the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind on that part of the southern coast of Newfoundland which extends from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands—

That is, this south red mark [indicating upon the map]—

on the western and northern coast of Newfoundland, from the said Cape Ray to the Quirpon Islands—

That carries us clear up to the northernmost point [indicating]— on the shores of the Magdalen Islands.

What is the difference between shores and bays? Is there any difference? We understand what they both mean. Geographically they obtain the same result. The shore is in its etymological root "shear." What cuts off the land from the sea is the shore. The coast-line is what marks the difference between sea and land. It may not mean at any time any more or any less than that, so far as the use of the words themselves go. Whatever artificial limitations of rights may come out of general rules of particular countries or the law of nations, everybody knows where a line is between the coast and the water and between the shore and the water, and they are the same thing.

Now we come to the right—

To dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbors, and creeks of the southern part of the coast of Newfoundland herein above described, and of the coast of Labrador; but, so soon as the same or any portion thereof shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such portion so settled without previous agreement for such purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground.

That is, it will require from each fisherman a private arrangement with the private proprietor concerning the land.

Here we have the same change from "on" to "in." When the treaty reads as to what is accorded to us, we have the right to fish "on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks from Mount Joly," etc.

Does that mean on the coast, not inclusive of bays, harbors, and creeks? Unless you can give this limitation to the right gained to fish on the coast, and not giving that right in the sinuosities of the harbors, creeks, and bays, as still coast-line, you do not get a right to fish in any of those. Your "on" must mean outside of a bay, in that contention, if you are to hold that when you come to the 3-mile belt it is the 3 miles outside the bay sea-line.

Now we come to the renunciation. It is historically true that, apparently, this definition and expression of our rights and liberties in the premises might have terminated without any negative limitations of exclusion. Under a motive which prompted our negotiators to show that this curtailment of our privilege did not rest upon the right of Great Britain, but on our exchange of our rights or our privileges as well as theirs, they provided these few lines, apparently unnecessary, except to secure this equality of right on each side in dealing in negotiation.

And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed—by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

Following the same question of dispute about them—

"The above-mentioned limits" were on the surface of the globe. The limits were geographical. The description of limits from Cape Ray to the Rameau Islands, and so on, was geographical, not limitations of enjoyment or of the penetration of that enjoyment into the sinuosities. Having thus the region definitely described, we proceed to describe, in the same sense and in the same language, our renunciation within geographical limits of others not included in the geographical limits that are thus settled as between us as a continued privilege of ours, and we use no single phrase or word of limitation except the 3 miles. We renounce this—

Within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

After we had renounced the fishing thus definitely geographically described, in dealing with the question of coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors, as a definition of the line, it is provided that our fishermen shall not enter into those bays, to wit, into that coast from which we had precluded ourselves. We had precluded ourselves from the coast. We had described the coast in the same language in which it had been described in 1783, as to what the right was; but after having thus excluded ourselves from 3 miles within the coastway including sinuosities, including harbors and bays, whatever they might be, we then said, but, even as towards those bays from which, as parts of the coast, we are precluded from fishing within 3 miles, we are to be allowed to enter—for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, and for no other purpose whatever.

Now comes the first assertion of any reserved right of either imperial or municipal or provincial legislation on the subject; but in regard to this limited entrance into the portions of bays, where we could only go for hospitality and protection, the restrictions shall be such—as may be necessary to prevent their taking, drying, or curing fish therein, or in any other manner whatever abusing the privileges hereby reserved to them.

Therefore there is no restriction in regard to any port that we have recourse to for fishing in the bays or creeks that we have recourse to for drying and curing, because we have these privileges of hospitality on those coasts. In regard to bays in which we have renounced the right, either of drying or curing or fishing, it is claimed that we have renounced all privileges of unmolested hospitality which are appurtenant to our rights conceded in the treaties.

Now, what did these restrictions mean? I shall not enlarge upon them; I shall not dwell upon them; but it is incontestable that the situation between the two countries, at the time, was of absolute interdict in trade, not only a limitation of exchanges of subjects, or by bottoms or what not, but an absolute interdict of any approach of trade into any of the dominions of these Provinces as a part of the general policy of the empire of Great Britain. The fishery is a privilege in every degree, if you please, whenever it comes to trespass upon trade. It is an enlargement of privilege when no privilege at all was accorded for trade to anybody else.

What was the reason why these fishing vessels which thus went for shelter, or repairs, for wood and water, were subjected not only to express and extensive limitations, but to a reserve of legislation to protect them? It was not on account of the necessity of preventing fishing or curing or drying fish. Those could be protected against abuse in the fisheries inside, within the 3 miles. The whole point was to preserve the trade intact, and that was only in the interest of Great Britain and not of the Provinces. It was wholly in the interest of keeping up the circuit of trade by which whatever was to be in the nature of commercial intercommunication between the United States and the Provinces should go the circuit of sending over to England and from England sending to the Provinces.

Therefore this was all in regard to smuggling; it was all in regard to encroachment on prohibited trade. I can understand it perfectly well. But, out of that restriction and the allowance of regulations to secure them against smuggling or trading has grown a strict limitation of our fishing rights of hospitality. I am not now speaking of our claim of enlargement of hospitality under the commercial arrangements now covering, as we say, all vessels, including those engaged in the fisheries. But I ask your attention to the hospitality in its proper construction, in the judgment, I think, of every lawyer and of every publicist. What does it mean when fishing vessels engaged in their pursuit on the neighboring shores of another nation—what does it mean when by friendly and open stipulation there is secured a right for the purpose of "shelter, and repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purpose?"

What were those purposes? They were all the purposes that fishermen in their pursuit needed. All other purposes were of mere trade. But whether the fishermen could carry tobacco; whether they could exchange this, that, or the other, or break into the circuit which Great Britain tenaciously adhered to as to all trade of different outlying colonies, was another question. When it comes to a fishing smack, that is to pursue the business of fishing between friendly nations, of which the shores are contiguous, and the home of the fishing vessel and of the fishermen is remote, what did we need in the proper sense of the language used between two great nations, the United States and Great Britain, what did these fishing smacks want of "supplies?" They took from home whatever they needed for their voyages that should be uninterrupted and unprolonged by disaster. But wood and water they could not carry. They could not take a supply of water for a three months' fishing, and they could not take wood for all the occasions of their cruises. Therefore "wood and water" were a description of what they needed in that regard.

As to the matter of bait, at that time they could catch bait. There was nobody there to catch it for them. It was an unsettled region, and when wood and water were provided for, it was saying that "notwithstanding the absolute interdict of any comer in entering a harbor for trade, you, by the same token that you have a right to fish, coming from your foreign home, shall have a right to find wood and water there, without stint and without limit."

What else did we secure against the vicissitudes of the sea? Was it against the tempest only, or was it for protection during the periods when fishing was interrupted by the habits and the vagaries of the fish? The vessels are to go there for the purpose of shelter. It is now said that this means we have only a right to scud before the storm, get "shelter," and leave when the tempest is over; and we must be in the open sea during the long intervals of the activity of our fishing interests, with all the watch and ward and constant lookout for the recurring tempests. We have a right to shelter, not only against the storm when it comes, but during the interval that our fishing does not occupy us, that we must in the open sea watch the storm. This is an answer for a great and friendly nation to make to us when our fishing is to be maintained, or disparaged by the hospitality essential to it or its denial. I believe by this new treaty we can only stay in shelter twenty-four hours.

Mr. FRYE. Not more than twenty-four hours upon entering at the custom-house.

Mr. EVARTS. That is, we have not the privilege of fishing. We can not stay there more than twenty-four hours.

Now, let us look and see whether we find in the Government of Great Britain a disposition thus to narrow and limit the broad meaning of our stipulated facilities in our fishing interests.

And for repairing damages therein.

What are "damages?" Who limits the damages? The tempests and the waves limit the damages. And when we go in there under a stipulated treaty with a great nation that within the shelter of those bays we shall repair, do they mean by that that we shall have in stock, on board every one of these fishing sloops, a blacksmith shop and a hardware store, and all the provisions for repair? Why, a prime minister of England that would haggle about that thing could face no Parliament with that pretense. It means that we are to be there with such rights and privileges as belong to every outcast and damaged vessel that needs succor, and that we shall have all that the shore affords. If we are to draw the vessel up on the beach and careen it and we have not force enough to do it, is the vessel to rot or go to pieces in the storm, because we can not hire provincial laborers for pay to have the vessel careened or hauled on shore? Shall we be told that if in the neighborhood we can find blacksmiths and shipwrights, and materials, we shall not have them and pay for them? Does it mean that if this be a coast where they are overtaken by a storm and we make our shelter, it is necessary for us to travel 20, 30, or 40 miles to a settlement to obtain workmen, materials, and supplies, and have them refused us?

I shall show that the whole motive, and the whole operation, and the whole (as I must conceive it) effrontery of these limitations that have been insisted upon by the provincials, has been to molest our fishermen, and deter them from their lawful pursuits.

Does not everybody know, would not every lawyer, would not every court, would not every Parliament say that when such language is used in an arrangement made "forever," anything contravening its natural effect is "molestation." I would like to hear somebody contradict that. What did they say "wood" for? Because "wood" was fuel, and if they had said "fuel" I suppose that would have included coal. But they said "wood." And now, when in the progress of discoveries we have contrivances on shipboard for dispensing with the bulk of wood and securing a compact provision of coal—and we need coal, because we have not any more fireplaces or stoves except those suited for coal—we are told that this treaty of 1818 was made to stipulate "forever" in the sense of hospitality, and provided for what we could not stow and carry. Now they say "we can not sell you coal; it is not so written in this treaty."

I never heard of such an interpretation being carried into a treaty—a treaty that is to last forever and is to adjust permanently rights, privileges, and hospitalities. Strange to say, and Senators will correct me if I am wrong, in this new treaty the only description of our rights is of "wood"—not an ounce of coal. After the difficulties, after the teasing, after the effrontery on one side and the boiling irritation against it on the other, the new treaty also is for "wood," and not for fuel so as to include coal.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, I would like to call his attention to what this treaty really provides for, in regard to the matter of which he has just been speaking. I will call his attention to the fact that the treaty now proposed to the Senate, being a treaty of interpretation of the treaty of 1818, mentions neither wood nor coal, nor "fuel" as the generic term for both. But the liberty and privilege and license to buy coal or wood or any fuel is fully provided for in the stipulation which allows fishing vessels on all occasions whatever to buy such supplies as are needed by traders.

Mr. EVARTS. That I understand perfectly well, but we are to pay for it all. We make a new bargain for it all. We throw away our own fisheries, we give up our coasts, we do everything except give a free market. We keep that one thing, but when you stand on the interpretation of our right, and our right to "wood" and wood only, still comes in even after the question of including "coal" has been raised.

Mr. GRAY. Do I understand the Senator from New York to say that the word "wood" is used in the treaty now before the Senate?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Where is it? I have not seen it.

Mr. EVARTS. Well——

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator from Delaware understand that there is any right in this treaty for our fishing vessels to buy whatever they please, as he states?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. FRYE. Is there not a limitation to a homeward voyage when the vessel is under distress?

Mr. GRAY. I do not understand that there is any such limitation.

Mr. FRYE. That is a very strange construction of the treaty, then.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from New York will indulge me, I would like to say a word in reply to the question propounded by the Senator from Maine as to whether I contended that there was any right in fishing vessels to buy fuel and all other supplies. I say unquestionably, under Article XI of the treaty now propounded, the right is attempted to be secured, and, if this treaty were ratified, would be secured, to fishing vessels upon all occasions whatever, to buy all needful supplies such as are usually sold to trading vessels, and that is the interpretation put upon it by the President, who sends the treaty to the Senate and comments upon it; it is the interpretation put upon it by the negotiators, and it is the interpretation that the language of the article justifies.

Mr. FRYE. Well, Mr. President, I simply desire to deny that. I say that no such interpretation is justified by the language; that if it is, the language in itself is utterly absurd. There is no provision there made for our vessels unless they are in distress and on the homeward voyage, and if the same vessel happens there again in distress and is on the homeward voyage she may receive that same provision that is made there—such provision as the Fiji Islanders would give us without any treaty. I do not want to have any further controversy about it.

Mr. GRAY. I do not believe that the Senator from Maine wants any controversy about it, or wants anybody to object to his construction of the treaty; but I want to say to him now, and I may have occasion to say it in my own time without trespassing on the courtesy of the Senator from New York, that Article XI does secure to American fishermen just those rights that I have enumerated; and if the Senator from Maine differs from me it is because he takes a narrower view of what this treaty means than the view I take and than that taken by those who advocate its ratification. We are advocating what we believe to be a broad and liberal provision in the interests of our fishermen; he opposes it because he believes it to be narrow and restricted.

Mr. FRYE. Not narrower than Sir Charles Tupper states it to be, I would say to the Senator.

Mr. GRAY. We must read the treaty within the four corners of it, and not what Sir Charles Tupper says about it.

Mr. EVARTS. Article XI of the treaty is, it is said, subject to opposing constructions. I shall have occasion, when I come to comment upon articles in detail, to treat that article in connection with the whole text of the treaty. But my eye now rests upon this word "wood:"

> They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, etc.

Now, does that word "wood," in the new treaty, mean "fuel?"

Mr. GRAY. You are quoting there the language of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. EVARTS. I am now reading the treaty before the Senate:

> When therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water.

Now, after this inquisition into the narrowness of "wood" as excluding "coal"—for of course that word excludes coal in the new treaty—let me call attention as rapidly as possible to the course of dealing between the countries since 1818. The first consideration in regard to the treaty of 1818 is that the treaty of 1783 is in force except as modified by the substitute arrangement of 1818, which affected only the liberties, and only the renunciated liberties, and as long as the treaty of 1818 remains in force. If the treaty of 1818 should be denounced by Great Britain, as it might be, and as it appears it would be if the perversity of the Provincials could induce that government to do it, then the treaty of 1783 revives, in all its provisions, subject only to an open question as to whether the war of 1812 had abrogated it.

When the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was talking about the propriety of abrogating the treaty of 1818, and mentioning his preference for that heroic form if he could be assured that our Government could back it up with war to insist upon the privileges of 1783, I asked him what he regarded to be the consequence, in public law, of its abrogation or denouncement, by either power—I refer to Great Britain and the United States—waiving the question of our abrogation, and he said that we should be without any treaty whatever. Now, my contention is that if the treaty of 1818 should be denounced by Great Britain, the treaty of 1783 would be in force—in force according to our American conception—subject to its proper interpretation whatever it was—subject only to notice on the part of Great Britain that they had claimed to treat the war of 1812 as an abrogation of the treaty of 1783, and our contention that it was not and never had been such an abrogation. And that will be the attitude between the two countries. If the treaty of 1818 passes out, then the treaty of 1783 comes back, one nation contending that it is in force and the other that, pro tanto at least, the war of 1812 had abrogated it.

Abundant authorities will show that nothing was more unfounded than the British pretension that the treaty of 1783 had been abrogated. Never, as we think, and so far as I know down to this moment, has it been contended that this Government conceded that the war of 1812 effected the abrogation.

Now, as rapidly as possible, I will endeavor to show what course of treaty, of negotiation, of diplomatic correspondence regarding the treaty of 1818, and its natural and reasonable pursuance of our rights, has appeared in what has passed between the two countries.

My proposition, in short, is this, that the object of the Canadians has always been not to observe the treaty of 1818, not to recognize our rational pursuance and protection of our fishing rights, but to make a persistent encroachment on these liberties and produce, at least, an irritation that would drive us into what? Not to any calm consideration of what the proper meaning of this treaty is, but an irritation of this great, patient, good-tempered, and magnanimous nation into ridding ourselves of these worriments upon our flanks by giving the Canadians things that they were eager for but that had nothing to do with their treaty rights in the matter of their and our respective fisheries.

They wanted an interchange of products of the coterminous territories; they wanted a free market for their fish; and their purpose was not to have delimitation, not to have an insistence on our part or an insistence on the part of Great Britain nor a treatment of the question that becomes those great nations; but their point was to aggravate and emphasize the opportunities and occasions of difference and of friction and of irritation and substitute that object and end as the body and substance of their treatment towards us.

I shall endeavor to show that whenever these treaties were made the occasion of strife or of force, when the powers of the United States and Great Britain were drawn into requisition to watch and protect the fishery rights, that was never according to the heart or the purpose of the Provinces; but that all should be diverted from a solution, and our country and Great Britain be inclined, under a treatment of provincial interests, to make arrangements and experiments of another kind and intent that should subordinate the line of demarkation in fishing to the prosperous and provident arrangement in their interest by which these other ulterior commercial operations would come into play.

From 1818 to 1843 it can not be said, in any proper sense, that the fisheries were a prominent occasion of marauding or a charge of marauding. Of course the beginning may be dated back to 1839. In 1843 the situation was produced, but it was on the part of the Provincials in preparation for an attempt to get reciprocity for a fish market. That went on until this Government declined entering into such an arrangement, and the Provinces, greatly irritated to be sure, succumbed; and from 1845 to 1851 diplomatic correspondence on the subject of the fisheries passes out of our view. In 1847 the Provinces had undertaken to proffer, by reciprocal legislation, a provision by which the natural products of the sea and of the coterminous region, that is of their territory and ours, should be interchanged. They passed a law in 1847, but Congress refused the desired reciprocal legislation. That irritated the Provinces still more, and they undertook to cause us some annoyance. Then the teasing began, and Great Britain began to insist upon her interpretation. Then came the debate in the Senate and the letter of Mr. Webster in 1852, until the end was gained—not of determining what the line was of interpretation of the treaty of 1818, but of overlooking it and making an arrangement about trade that swallowed up the treaty right and swamped the treaty interests on either side. In 1851 we made the treaty of reciprocity.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he can cite any case or authority for saying that we had rejected overtures of reciprocity before 1854 made to us in diplomatic form by the Government of Great Britain?

Mr. EVARTS. No.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can not do it?

Mr. EVARTS. I do not say that I can not do it. I only say——

Mr. MORGAN. I have never seen anything of the kind and I do not believe it exists. I believe the proposition came from us for reciprocity in 1854.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not say anything about it; whether I could say it is another thing. I adhere to what I have said; but that all the irritation tended on their side to reciprocity and that there was no such tendency upon our part is plain. I have brought that to the test. In 1847, despairing of treaty arrangements, they undertook in comity and good neighborhood to have reciprocal legislation. In 1847 they passed a law that should have effect when we passed a corresponding law, and we refused reciprocity.

Mr. MORGAN. If I understand the Senator from New York, his position is that the Government of the United States in 1854 was worried by the Canadians into the reciprocity arrangement, that they were "teasing," as the Senator has expressed it, and "iritating" and pressing until after awhile they worried this Government into the reciprocity arrangement.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the way of it?

Mr. EVARTS. I understand that the system of worrying was always brought into play whenever we asserted our rights in fishing, and they asserted their contravention of it, in order to bring us to a departure from the fishing interests to the trading and commercial interests. There never has been a doubt of it. Whenever this irritation and teasing in the interests of trade induced the governments to try experiments of reciprocal interchange, then this resort merged the causes of irritation, and any adjudications or determinations were also merged therein for the time.

At every stage when the Dominion undertook to enforce the line of a bay or a headland line, or anything else, the British Government declined, and there never was an attitude of practical enforcement that the British Government were ready to assume towards us of the headland or the bay line in question. The matter passed off, the question passed off, on the part of the Provinces when they found that the British Government would not back them up, and merged the question into reciprocal trade.

In 1843, when an urgent political situation existed, seizure was made, outside of 3 miles, of the Washington and the Argus. That was settled. How long, how little time, between nations are instances to be submitted to arbitration as settling a principle without its being settled, when it is determined and the award is paid? How in our courts—how in this great court, the supreme tribunal here—how is a question settled between private parties by suits between A and B to determine whether a law of a State or a law of the United States is unconstitutional? And when the court determines that question by releasing the defendant from liability, or holding him, the instance settles the proposition. The Government of England has never shown any alacrity to discuss the question whether these seizures were within 8 miles or 10 miles or within headlands or within bay—but as nothing but a decision whether it was within 3 miles. And not a seizure has been made since without that belt.

Now, let me ask attention to what the British Government did. In 1842, or thereabouts, some legal opinions were given by the law advisers of the Crown. In 1842 what did Lord Stanley write to Lord Falkland when the agitation was flagrant on the subject? Was Lord Stanley in a hurry in communicating the opinions to the governor-general? They were finally forwarded in November, 1842, accompanied by a letter to Lord Falkland stating that—

> The subject has frequently engaged the attention of myself and my colleagues with the view of adopting further measures, if necessary, for the protection of British interests in accordance with the law as laid down in the opinion. We have, however, on full consideration, come to the conclusion, as regards the fisheries of Nova Scotia, that the precautions taken by the provincial legislature appear adequate for the purpose, and that being practically admitted by the Americans, no further measures are required.

And the British Government took no further measures.

What was the next step? In 1843 the question was raised by the seizure of the Washington and of the Argus, and the umpire, Mr. Bates, an eminent and able man, a native of Boston and an American citizen, was fixed upon as an arbitrator by the British Government and acceded to by us, and that arbitrament is before the Senate and has been commented on—and commented on in such communication between the Governments as might be. My comment on that is that the British Government had before practically taken the position and the point that these decisions of the umpire were, practically, decisive on the subject of the 3-mile limit and are yet undisturbed.

Then Mr. Everett and Lord Aberdeen and Lord Stanley went on and the British Government were on the point of consenting to a final and peremptory communication to the Provincial authorities that they were not going to insist on any line outside of the 3 miles. Mr. Everett wrote home that that communication was to be made, and that communication was prepared to be made. Then the Provinces undertook a teasing, again, of Great Britain, with regard to their interests, and a withholding of that deliberate opinion and conclusion and concession—to worry through their interests, if they could. And in 1854 that worrying ended in the reciprocity treaty.

Now, look at the immediate effect on these friends of ours—our amicable neighbors—for they can only be found fault with for too great zeal in their own interests, as, for instance, by construing "wood" as not equivalent to fuel—from the making of the reciprocity treaty until its abrogation.

> Nova Scotia increased in wealth and prosperity at a most extraordinary rate. From its abrogation until the present—

This was written in 1869—

> we have retrograded with the most frightful rapidity.

That is the attitude. Who would not fight for unexampled prosperity against frightful calamities? Our friends have never in the agitation been ready to meet the awkwardness of the interpretation, nor has Great Britain ever been willing to stand a challenge to adhere to it. This process, this method of the Provinces is an impetration upon us in the absence of logic. As Hudibras says, it works—

> Not by force of carnal reason,
> But indefatigable teasing.

And it has been very successful. You can tease a great and powerful and neighboring nation with prosperity open all around us. When we are brought into a critical period of resisting rights, then, under the anomalous condition by which England, in its relation to its Provinces, has always undertaken to treat with us, as it were, per interpositam personam, it is left for the Provinces to make trouble, to make complaints, to make the teasing and the imputations, and then they say to the Canadians, in effect, "Well, we can not back you up in these methods, but we will let you run along if you can prevail on your great neighbor to give what you seek," and that is, reciprocity and a free market.

The convention of 1854 was an experiment which might be anticipated as to result in benefits one way or the other. It was an honest arrangement, made and adhered to, which we were beguiled into making. It was not imposed upon us. What was called reciprocity and equality in phrases may not be equality in substance. They said "Give us markets for all the things we can raise, and we will give you markets for the same things." Well, what a proposition! What market had they there for us? What a market had we here for them! Different industries, a different population, a different distribution of gains, of wages, of independence, of conditions of life. I waive all that, but our market is illimitable. We are told that it is reciprocity to say "we will buy of you if you will buy of us."

In order to make reciprocity equal we should say, "We will buy as much of you as you buy of us," and until we come to a fair and full understanding with the Dominion upon the tariff and upon the fisheries and upon reciprocity in productions, we can understand what specific exchange of markets, to be equal, must be and no more. "We will buy as much of you as you will buy of us." But to say that it is equality to give up our omnivorous market for the limited, the stinted consumption on the other side is but a phrase-monger's equality.

Mr. GRAY. I am very loth to interrupt the Senator from New York, but I will call his attention to the fact that the statistics of trade between Canada and the United States during the existence of the reciprocity treaty show that the balance of trade was on the side of the United States, and that we sold the Canadians more than we bought of them.

Mr. EVARTS. We tried it for twelve years, and we were satisfied which side the balance of advantage was. That does not alter the progressive opportunity of an illimitable market. It is only limited by their power of producing. They built themselves up. They did build themselves up through the reciprocity, as I have read to you. An example of prosperity and an alarming rapidity of decline on the abrogation—that is what the experience of reciprocity showed.

Mr. President, it may be fairly said that from 1845 until 1885, which is forty years, or if you take it more peremptorily, from 1854—thirty years—there has been a modus vivendi created out of reciprocity between the Provinces and ourselves. It has been our withdrawal of their interest of interference with our fisheries, by the great benefits conferred upon them of the reciprocity granted by this treaty. We may, therefore, treat the attitude of the new Administration when it came into power and had occasion in the spring of 1885 to take up the actual attitude, as having before them between the two countries a long period of from thirty to forty years, in which the acerbities and the irritation between the two countries on the question of the fisheries was neither evident nor obtrusive.

I do not omit from consideration the interval of four or five years between the termination of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 (that is, from 1866) and the renewal of reciprocity by the treaty of 1871. There was an easing off at any rate and a contrivance of a modus vivendi by our fishermen purchasing licenses, which were expected to work favorably and usefully to the exchequer of the Provinces, and which was calculated to assuage the irritation growing out of the termination of the treaty of 1854. But that scheme proved a complete failure. There were some thousands of dollars, I believe, paid in licenses when $2 per ton was charged, when $1 was charged, and when 50 cents was charged.

That came to an end. It was a wicker-work of bullrushes against the tide of our prosperity. Then came the treaty of 1871, in regard to which this is to be said, that the treaty of 1871 was prompted and occupied by much greater questions than the fisheries. No more benevolent or far-sighted diplomacy was ever put in motion between two great nations than that which was started from this side of the water, under the direction of Governor Seward, to extract a grievance which would, if not assuaged, have been an irremediable wound between them.

Thursday, August 9, 1888.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, I had undertaken to expose to the consideration of the Senate, yesterday, the tenor and treatment between the two governments touching upon this fishery privilege and right, its exercise, and its obstruction, and had brought myself to the last treaty bearing upon this matter, and that is the treaty of 1871; but I will, for a moment, complete any references that I needed to make as to the attitude of the British Government to these pretensions on the part of the Canadians and towards the United States whenever the topic became critical and pressing.

I think I did not refer to what occurred in 1852 on the eve of the events which led to the treaty of 1854. Things being ripe between the governments for action in these fishing regions, orders were given to Sir Thomas Hardy merely to prevent Americans from fishing within 3 miles from the shore. At that time the matter thus stood, and until the decision of the umpire in 1853. When we were approaching the period immediately antecedent to the treaty of 1871, this was the final treatment on this subject by Earl Kimberley, the secretary for the colonies in 1871, in a letter to Lord Lisgar:

> The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood and of obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818 and by the terms of the Imperial act, 59 George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure, inconsistent with the general policy of the empire, and say they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government, under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling, and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects.

Mr. President, although the British Government has spoken with reserve in its communications with provincial authorities by saying that this or that might be the strict letter or construction, the British Government has never announced as towards this Government that it would insist upon any such interpretation and conclusion to be put in action; and this polite intercourse between the ministry abroad and the authorities of the Provinces means only this: Whatever you may urge upon Great Britain in adoption of these extreme interpretations and these harsh exactions and enforcements, we wish you to understand that the British Government has undertaken to enter into no such situation and no such engagements in your favor towards the United States.

Now, a little out of order, perhaps, and yet as bearing upon the question as to whether the course of the Provinces has been followed as a means of aggravating and molesting the fishermen of the United States in the exercise of their pursuits, I will call the attention of the Senate to a very remarkable letter, and a very creditable letter, from Mr. Bayard to Mr. Phelps, dated the 8th of February, 1887. After some introductory observations of approval of Minister Phelps's course, the Secretary proceeds:

> As part of the general case, and as bearing with unusual clearness upon the Canadian claims of construction of the convention of 1818, I transmit herewith copies of a note from Sir Lionel West, dated the 28th ultimo, inclosing a dispatch from Lord Lansdowne, governor-general of Canada, to Mr. Stanhope, dated November 9, 1886, which is accompanied by reports of the committee of the privy council for Canada, and of Mr. Thompson, the minister of justice at Ottawa.
> It may be noted that this reply of the British minister at this capital to my note to him of May 20, 1886, is dated on the 28th ultimo, giving some eight months for the completion of the circuit of correspondence.
>
> At page 15 of the printed inclosure and in the last paragraph will be found the explicit avowal of claim by the Canadian Government to employ the convention of 1818 as an instrument of interference with the exercise of open-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and to give it such a construction as will enable the fishermen of the Provinces better to compete at less "disadvantage in the markets of the United States" in the pursuit of the deep-sea fisheries.
>
> At the outset of this discussion, in my note to Sir Lionel West, of May 10, 1886, I said:
> "The question, therefore, arises whether such a construction is admissible as would convert the treaty of 1818 from being an instrumentality for the protection of the in-shore fisheries along the described parts of the British American coasts into a pretext or means of obstructing the business of deep-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and of interrupting and destroying the commercial intercourse that since the treaty of 1818, and independent of any treaty whatever, has grown up and now exists under the concurrent and friendly laws and mercantile regulations of the respective countries."

The Secretary proceeds:

> When I wrote this I hardly expected that the motives I suggested, rather than imputed, would be admitted by the authorities of the Provinces, and was entirely unprepared for a distinct avowal thereof, not only as regards the obstruction of deep-sea fishing operations by our fishermen, but also in respect of their independent commercial intercourse, yet it will be seen that the Canadian minister of justice avers that it is "most prejudicial" to the interests of the provinces "that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext."

Now, in the politeness of this diplomatic intercourse it is easy to appreciate what penetration had discovered before, but it was perhaps not so demonstrated as to justify the suggestion of what I have alleged as the object, as the motive, as the instigation, as the stimulant of the treatment we receive in molestation of our enjoyments, the restriction of our secured treaty privileges. The object is an ulterior one, that there shall not be an adequate and an impartial devision between us of the stipulated rights of fishery under the treaty of 1818, but that the Provinces are determined that by such use, according to a very famous phrase, of "the means that God and nature have put into their hands," they mean to exclude and to disparage and to enfeeble and impoverish the profits and enjoyments of our fishing industry.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator gets away from the historical view of the case which he has just been presenting, I think it is quite fair to him to say that for the statement of the British attitude upon the subject of the bays and the headlands I rely upon the confidential memorandum for the use of the commissioners on the part of the United States in the American-British Joint High Commission that was communicated to our commissioners by the Secretary of State, and the statement is made at the close of a very long historical narrative of events connected with this treaty of 1818, to inform our commissioners of what was the true attitude of the British contention.

Mr. EVARTS. Does the Senator mean the present commissioners?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I mean the commissioners of 1871. This doubtless has escaped the Senator's attention, but our Government, as I understand it, in this matter had committed itself in 1871 absolutely to a recognition of what the British contention was and laid it before our commissioners, and presented the attitude of that government towards ours on the subject of the headland theory and the interpretation of the words "bays, creeks, and harbors" in the treaty of 1818.

On June 3, 1870, says Mr. Fish to the commissioners:

> Mr. Thornton communicated officially to the Department the instructions issued to the commander of the British naval forces, by which it would appear that, notwithstanding the decision of the umpire in 1853, Her Majesty's Government in 1866 were "clearly of the opinion that by the convention of 1818 the United States have renounced the right of fishing not only within 3 miles of the colonial shores, but within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek; but that they are not disposed, for the present, to enforce what they regard as their rights."—Foreign Relations, 1870, page 419.
> The whole correspondence in the book last cited, from page 407 to page 434, bears directly upon the issues now raised.
> Mr. Thornton informed Mr. Fish that he had "received instructions from Earl Granville to explain to Mr. Fish that the instructions respecting the limits within which the prohibition of fishing is to be enforced against the United States fishermen are not to be considered as constituting an arrangement between the governments of the United States and of Great Britain, by which Canadian rights are waived, or the United States fishermen invested with any privilege.

It appears to me that that is a thorough committal on the part of our Government to its own commissioners in regard to the attitude of the British Government, and it was left in that condition.

Mr. EVARTS. There is nothing in the statement which my friend from Alabama reads that at all interferes with the propositions I have laid down. I have allowed that the British Government permitted the Provincials—I will not say to hold in terrorem over the United States, but that they should use it as a make-weight, as far as they could, to press forward to the ultimate object, which was the acquisition of our market by the Canadian fishermen and the participation of the reciprocity of products on each side of the line. The statement read that the British Government wished to reserve, that they had not committed themselves to a waiver of these pretensions, I find nothing in force or in terms that in that statement varies from that which I have adduced as the attitude and feeling of the British Government whenever the critical point was reached as to whether this or that practical enforcement was to be insisted upon.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the honorable Senator from New York indulge me one moment?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to get the record right about this. When the treaty of Washington was in full force in 1874, "A draught of a treaty for the reciprocal regulations of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provisions for the enlargement of the Canadian canals and for their use by the United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels, together with a report from the Secretary of State," was sent in by President Grant June 18, 1874.

The proposed treaty was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That treaty contained, as I count, one hundred and forty articles or classes of articles for reciprocal interchange between the United States and Canada without paying duty in either country, and in that list are included fish of all kinds, fish products, and all other creatures living in the water, except fish preserved in oil. That would include shell-fish. General Grant in sending that treaty to the Senate accompanied it with the following message:

To the Senate of the United States:

The plenipotentiaries of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington have submitted to the Secretary of State, for my consideration, a draught of a treaty for the reciprocal regulation of the commerce and trade between the United States and Canada, with provisions for the enlargement of the Canadian canals and for their use by United States vessels on terms of equality with British vessels. I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with a copy of the draught thus proposed.

I am of the opinion that a proper treaty for such purposes would result beneficially to the United States. It would not only open or enlarge markets for our productions, but it would increase the facilities of transportation from the grain-growing States of the West to the seaboard.

The proposed draught has many features to commend it to our favorable consideration; but whether it makes all the concessions which could justly be required of Great Britain, or whether it calls for more concessions from the United States than we sho ld yield, I am not prepared to say.

Among its provisions are articles proposing to dispense with the arbitration respecting fisheries, which was provided for by the treaty of Washington in the event of the conclusion and ratification of a treaty, and the passage of all the necessary legislation to enforce it.

These provisions, as well as other considerations, make it desirable that this subject should receive attention before the close of the present session. I therefore express an earnest wish that the Senate may be able to consider and determine, before the adjournment of Congress, whether it will give its constitutional concurrence to the conclusion of a treaty with Great Britain for the purposes already named, either in such form as is proposed by the British plenipotentiaries or in such other more acceptable form as the Senate may prefer.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, June 18, 1874.

I do not know, Mr. President, that anybody ever held a higher relation of authority and influence in the Republican party than General Grant, and I do not believe that you ever had a man who deserved more. He was a very wise and able man; I always have thought so. I understand that message to be a distinct avowal on his part not only in favor of general reciprocity with Canada, but to include what had never before been included in any treaty, fish of all kinds, including even shell-fish and the animals of the sea of every kind, to be exchanged reciprocally between these two countries. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New York to that fact, because I shall rely upon it in remarks that I shall have to make on this treaty hereafter in showing both the attitude of the Republican party and the real state of the question.

Mr. EVARTS. I shall not occupy myself further, nor have I very much so done hitherto, with the topic of what the action of the different parties had been on matters of negotiation. The record of them all is open to all. The conduct of affairs until 1860 was in Democratic hands, with the exception only of the period of President Harrison in 1841, followed by President Tyler filling out his term, and then the term of President Taylor filled out by President Fillmore. The treatment by Democratic Administrations included the Presidencies of Monroe, of Adams, of Jackson, of Van Buren, of Polk, of Pierce, and Buchanan, all of whose administrations were periods of Democratic conduct and responsibility.

In 1860 it can be very well understood that other matters occupied the attention of this Government than the pressure of interests connected with the fisheries; and when a conclusion of the civil war was reached and the process of reconstruction, we come to a period when, as I stated yesterday, the very benevolent and very far sighted diplomacy of Governor Seward took up the situation between these two Governments as produced by the grievances we had suffered from the course pursued by the British Government and the British public while our civil war was raging.

That grievance Mr. Seward thought, that grievance I think now, all sober and thoughtful minds that had been in loyal relation to the Government in suppressing the rebellion felt must be extracted from between the Governments or that it would produce, as I stated yesterday, an immedicable wound. What then was the situation? To bring this great nation, this great friendly nation, into such a discussion by reason and by arbitration that should solve and measure this grievance and extract it. Undoubtedly the British Government was very reluctant to enter into such a solution. Nor did their public men imagine at the outset that they could be brought by any considerations whatever to that disposition; but they were brought to it under a persistent, a mild and persuasive, but a convincing, diplomatic correspondence that made it apparent that when there was an opportunity between these nations to consider in calmness and in peace this antecedent transaction, they must need to treat it, when unhappy provocation to it might arise, by a much heavier, a most calamitous arbitrament.

Two treaties then were made, but the Senate rejected them as not carrying the obligation of the British Government far enough. Then, under the wise administration of General Grant and the wise and prosperous conduct of our foreign relations by Secretary Fish, there was brought about an assemblage of grave questions that formed the subjects of the treaty of Washington. Whatever may be thought defective, or whatever may have been disappointed in reference to the inferior topic of the fisheries there embraced, this was as great a treaty as ever was made between great Christian and friendly nations, resulting in composing a strife that, but for the large reach and the civil prudence shown on both sides that was brought into play, would never have been disposed of without breaking the peace of the world.

When General Grant had taken the attitude by an announcement that this Government would acquire by purchase and payment the private grievances inflicted upon our shipping on the seas, and thus the United States should stand face to face with Great Britain in the prosecution of all these rights, both of citizens and their maritime property and of the United States in its national grievances, there came about a disposition, honorable on both sides, to make this treaty dispose of, as well, this great and direct contention as other inferior matters still unadjusted between the countries. The great subject of the Vancouver Straits, the division there that had never been settled, was brought into the assemblage and the ever-present fishery dispute put into this budget and was disposed of.

Senators will understand, and the public men of England and the public men of the United States, understood that the treaty of 1871 was not brought about between these two countries for the purpose of renewing and settling the fishery troubles. They formed but an item of easement to the great and principal topics, greater than were ever before placed between two great countries, and of course, when the dignity and the pride and the reason of Great Britain were brought into an arrangement for leaving to other great nations what her conduct had been and her responsibility in the matter, this other great question becoming pressing of the division of the straits on the northwest, of course if this would seem to be or should be an item of arrangement and consultation, why should it not be embraced? And when we came to the suggestion that this matter of the great fisheries might also be included, when this proposition was made, the fisheries matter bore its part in the great settlement. When we came to that minor topic, when the great and principal questions had been arranged for according to the reasonable, but yet the firm demands of the United States, it might readily excuse in the negotiations a facility and a generosity on our part in regard to this lasting and favorite topic, not of Great Britain, but of the Provinces.

There were several advantages that grew out of the actual treatment of the fishery question under the treaty of 1871. In the first place this treatment illustrates the unbounded audacity of the Provinces in pretensions which they put forward in regard to the values of what they had to exchange with us for what they desired from us. The vast advantages to them that were to be communicated by us in exchange for what they had to part with and without which the treaty would be of no value to them, I mean our market, were apparent. But as soon as this market was conceded under their demand of this condition as the only exchange of equivalents that could compensate the Provinces for the immense concessions they wished us to understand they would have made in exchange for our market—when this was gained the whole tone and estimate of these equivalents was changed.

When we came to weigh and estimate these respective advantages of free fish on the one side and inshore fishing on the other, the Provinces took the ground that there was really no advantage at all to them in the free fishing; that this fiscal arrangement was as important, if not more important, to us than it was to them. But a comparison of values between inshore fishery and the free market for the Canadians in our consumption, seemed to show this was an absurd proposition. How can you contend for a moment, we answered, that any make-weight should be thrown in for the inshore fisheries, beyond the advantage of the free market? Well, the matter was good-naturedly disposed of, apparently, upon the notion pressed upon us, as most satisfactory to the Provinces if, at least, it shall be shown them there has been an impartial examination provided for into this comparison of the equivalents that were exchanged, to determine whether a make-weight was necessary in the nature of owelty of partition. Under this easy complaisance on our part we were served with a demand on the part of the Provinces of $15,000,000 for the enjoyment of the inshore fisheries for the twelve years, as a make-weight to be counted and measured in exchange for and over and above what we had given in our free market for their fish.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New York will indulge me while I call his attention to the protocols that were agreed upon by the negotiators of that treaty in regard to this fishery business:

The subject of the fisheries was further discussed at the conferences on the 7th, 20th, 22d, and 25th of March. The American commissioners stated that if the value of the inshore fisheries could be ascertained the United States might prefer to purchase, for a sum of money, the right to enjoy, in perpetuity, the use of these inshore fisheries in common with British fishermen, and mentioned $1,000,000 as the sum they were prepared to offer. The British commissioners replied that this offer was, they thought, wholly inadequate, and that no arrangement would be acceptable of which the admission into the United States free of duty of fish, the produce of the British fisheries, did not form a part, adding that any arrangement for the acquisition by purchase of the inshore fisheries in perpetuity was open to grave objection.

The American commissioners inquired whether it would be necessary to refer any arrangement for purchase to the Colonial or Provincial Parliament.

The British commissioners explained that the fisheries within the limits of maritime jurisdiction were the property of the several British colonies, and that it would be necessary to refer any arrangement which might affect colonial property or rights to the Colonial or Provincial Parliament; and that legislation would also be required on the part of the Imperial Parliament.

During these discussions the British commissioners contended that these inshore fisheries were of great value, and that the most satisfactory arrangement for their use would be a reciprocal tariff arrangement, and reciprocity in the coasting trade; and the American commissioners replied that their value was overestimated; that the United States desired to secure their enjoyment, not for their commercial or intrinsic value, but for the purpose of removing a source of irritation; and that they could hold out no hope that the Congress of the United States would give its assent to such a tariff arrangement as was proposed, or to any extended plan of reciprocal free admission of the products of the two countries; but that, inasmuch as one branch of Congress had recently, more than once, expressed itself in favor of the abolition of duties on coal and salt, they would propose that coal, salt, and fish be reciprocally admitted free; and that, inasmuch as Congress had removed the duty from a portion of the lumber heretofore subject to duty, and as the tendency of legislation in the United States was toward the reduction of taxation and of duties in proportion to the reduction of the public debt and expenses, they would further propose that lumber be admitted free from duty from and after the 1st of July, 1874, subject to the approval of Congress, which was necessary on all questions affecting import duties.

The British commissioners, at the conference on the 17th of April, stated that they had referred this offer to their Government, and were instructed to inform the American commissioners that it was regarded as inadequate, and that Her Majesty's Government considered that free lumber should be granted at once, and that the proposed tariff concessions should be supplemented by a money payment.

The American commissioners then stated that they withdrew the proposal which they had previously made of the reciprocal free admission of coal, salt, and fish, and of lumber after July 1, 1874; that that proposal had been made entirely in the interest of a peaceful settlement, and for the purpose of removing a source of irritation and of anxiety; that its value had been beyond the commercial or intrinsic value of the rights to have been acquired in return; and that they could not consent to an arrangement on the basis now proposed by the British commissioners; and they renewed their proposal to pay a money equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries. They further proposed that in case the two governments should not be able to agree upon the sum to be paid as such an equivalent, the matter should be referred to an impartial commission for determination.

The British commissioners replied that this proposal was one on which they had no instructions, and that it would not be possible for them to come to any arrangement except one for a term of years and involving the concession of free fish and fish-oil by the American commissioners; but that if free fish and fish-oil were conceded, they would inquire of their Government whether they were prepared to assent to a reference to arbitration as to money payment.

The American commissioners replied that they were willing, subject to the action of Congress, to concede free fish and fish-oil as an equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries, and to make the arrangement for a term of years; that they were of the opinion that free fish and fish-oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries, but that they were also willing to agree to a reference to determine that question and the amount of any money payment that might be found necessary to complete an equivalent, it being understood that legislation would be needed before any payment could be made.

The subject was further discussed in the conferences of April 18 and 19, and the British commissioners having referred the last proposal to their Government, and received instructions to accept it, the treaty Articles XVIII to XXV were agreed to at the conference on the 22d of April.

I understand that was a proposition coming from us to give them free fish and free oil.

Mr. EVARTS. I yielded the floor to the Senator for an inquiry, but certainly the Senator can hardly have supposed that I was not familiar with that protocol and everything connected with it. It has no more to do with the progress of my debate than all the other examinations that have been made on all sides of this Chamber as to the history of the relations between the two governments.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon for the interruption, Mr. President. I will not renew it, of course. I understood the Senator to say that the proposition for free fish had been forced on our Government all the time by the anxious and determined worrying, as he said yesterday, by the efforts of the British Government to force us into a condition where we must accept free fish. I understand that General Grant and this protocol both offered free fish.

Mr. EVARTS. Whatever I said is in the record. It is a service and an advantage in debate by interpellation to call attention to facts; but to intrude into a speech documents to support an opposite opinion does not seem to me to be within the range of valuable intercommunication between Senators.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from New York is an able and experienced statesmen, and he made a statement yesterday and to-day that I think is contradicted by the record with which he says he is entirely familiar.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator's interposition is unnecessary. He has an abundant opportunity in the resources of his own reason and his own explorations, including these documents, to refute my propositions as he may think it suitable.

Mr. President, the treaty of 1871 included this disposition of the fisheries, and it included a mode of disposing explicitly and directly, as a matter of value in computation, what the inshore fishery was worth, and then what our market was worth, and then which overtopped the other. Under this easy disposition shown on the part of our negotiators to have an examination whether there was or was not a make-weight in addition to these principal equivalents, then grew a Provincial pretension that fifteen millions was the value of the inshore fisheries over our free market. The result of the Halifax commission produced an award in which our commission did not concur, that $5,500,000 should settle that balance. I do not intend to discuss or observe upon either the steps taken in the deliberations or in the conclusions in that money estimate; but this examination enables us for once and for all, as I shall have occasion to press more distinctly hereafter upon all the Provincial interchanges with us, that the value of the inshore fisheries has been determined, not by the award, but by the conclusions and proofs which are satisfactory to our people, and I think demonstrative to the people of the Provinces, as to the little value or importance of the inshore fisheries to us.

Now, Mr. President, having thus come to a conclusion, in 1885, of the conventions of temporary durability of 1854 and 1871, the two countries were brought into an attitude to take up, so far as might be useful and in such manner as might be useful, the attitude between the two countries. All our people were satisfied and delighted to be emancipated from the obligations of the treaty of 1871, as they had been delighted to be emancipated from the obligations of the treaty of 1854. There was not from one corner of this land to the other, there was not among the fishermen, there was not among commercial interests, there was not among public men, there was not in either House of Congress any desire or any expression of desire for any renewed negotiations. We had thus reached the bottom of the value of the inshore fisheries and the value of our market and of what was left; that is, of irritations. We desired that this fishery should be left to that peaceful and regular solution between the two countries that each should advance its pretensions, its complaints, its infractions, and then proceed by the methods known to civilized nations of determining what the meaning and what the rights of the treaty of 1818 were.

I ask attention now in regard to these fisheries, to which I have referred as a subject of interest to our people from the history of the Government, and now of as great interest to them as ever. In addition I wish to ask attention to the rules of the law of nations as understood to govern in interpretation or limitation of the territorial rights, as they are called, of the littoral dominion in this or that government over the adjacent seas. It is, I take it, not disputed that all this area of the fishing waters is on the high seas. Wherever it is, if it be below the low-water mark, there by the demand and by the consent of all nations the high seas begin. All, then, our right there, as originally established in 1783 and 1818, and as claimed or occupied and enjoyed by other foreign nations, all this fishing by our fishermen is on the high seas. Now, how does there come to be, and to what extent, a deference or a concession over adjacent waters; for without the deference and concession of the nations no nation can claim seaward, beyond that line between high water and low water, at its own will, the power in any sense of appropriating to itself any part of the high seas. The high seas are not capable of appropriation by the demand of one nation, except by the concession of another, or by the general concession governing the rights and needs of all the nations. Whence comes this notion that, although the high seas began where the tide marks its last recession, there is in the littoral shores some advantages accorded to the proprietary government that occupies and exercises dominion over the shores. What is the rule? In the first place, without any discussion of how it comes about, a strip of 3 miles along the shore, in all its sinuosities, measured from low-water mark, is the limit of the conceded right. Then, in regard to bays, recesses, ports, and harbors, this shore co nomine, the 3-mile strip, follows the windings of every port and of every bay and of every harbor, but when by concession, either, as I have stated, of explicit and individual concession, or of a general arrangement in regard to ports and bays and harbors not continuing the high seas as the common possession of all nations, what does that rest upon? Does it rest upon the right of a foreign nation to expropriate the seas and appropriate the seas as an appurtenant to land by its fiat or by merely natural and geographical marks? No. As in respect to the original belt of 3 miles, so all the rights in regard to bays, harbors, ports, or what not, it is one of deference or of concession on the part of the nations making up the system, which make and execute what is called the law of nations, determine what are the ports and what are the harbors and what are the bays that under a rightful need and occasion of the state whose shores are washed, should be reasonably required and reasonably be conceded by the nations.

There is a retirement from what should be classed as the high seas, and to be treated as appropriated for the uses of shore population—not of fishing, not of any other occupation that I have regarded, except that really they reserve these bays and ports for occupation for land purposes, and as the necessary protection of their system of customs and of trade.

What was the extent of deference for these 3 miles? Is it pretended that the ownership within the 3 miles is conceded to the nation whose shores are washed? Has the nation a right to exclude for the purposes of navigation those 3 miles? This never has been pretended; it never has been claimed, and it never has been conceded; it never will be conceded. This belt is high seas for navigation, and there is no concession within 3 miles, eo nomine, in respect of peaceful navigation, by the nations of the earth. There is a degree of deference—when the superior requirement for the ownership and dominion of the land demands the land's protection in favor of the nation which occupies it—on the part of the nations of the world and they recede for that 3 miles, but respecting only the reasonable degree and measure and force of this special enjoyment, and of the exclusion and diminution of the general and common enjoyment of the high seas.

All this can be included in two propositions as to the concession, advantage, and enjoyment on the part of the littoral control over this belt. First, in time of war nations have a right, if they are belligerents, to expect such protection of their approaches as befits them, and when war rages only between other belligerents, the neutral nations require that the war shall not be prosecuted within that belt. Do they deny that the war ships of belligerents can pursue their navigation within the belt? Never. Do they hold that a war ship can not enter within the belt to escape from an enemy and enjoy that advantage? Their proposition is that the war shall not be introduced within the 3-mile belt, and that if an enemy is pursued within the belt and is captured, the littoral nation shall hold itself responsible for that invasion, make itself responsible for not preventing it. That practice is almost all there is in regard to this general subject.

Then there is a deference in regard to fishing, and that is a general deference, that within 3 miles of the shores, which means the coast, which means the shore, which means the same belt, whether it follows sinuosities or whether it belongs to the trend of the coast, 3 miles from the land is the concession by the law of nations for a ship, and when bays and harbors are to be enlarged into exclusion of foreign fishing without the line of 3 miles from land, then it must be under the deference that has the domestic purposes of trade. The population around the bays that are thus appropriated has secured the right to them by the progress of influence that secures the control from a foreign nation. Was it ever pretended that the assumption of exclusion from bays for fishing was to depend on a geographer or a map-maker because it was called a bay instead of being called a gulf? Are Baffin's and Hudson Bay taken from the high seas because the geographers have called them bays and not gulfs or seas? Not at all. It is precisely this deference of concession and depending entirely on whether the overbalancing demands in the particular localities should require us to retire from the high seas in favor of advantages to the shores.

Now here is the Bay of Chaleurs, here is Ascension Bay, here is Miramichi Bay, here are non-enumerated bays on this coast, called bays instead of gulfs, and because they now are classed as bays is that the enumeration that is included in any of the demarkation of liberties to us under the treaty of 1783 or the treaty of 1818? Not in the least. It is not a harbor, it is not a port; it is not surrounded by population where exclusive control is necessary for the purposes of customs and for the protection of the port or excluding the crowd of fishermen from interfering with the commerce of the sea-going vessels. Not in the least. This is [indicating on the map] I do not know how many miles wide. All of that is high sea.

Whence does this right come, that under any of the rules governing nations a bay is to be made a bay simply by its geographical name? No; in the treaties of 1818 and 1783 unoccupied coasts when excluded from fishing are only to be excluded by the 3-mile limit and nothing else, because they are parts of shores and nothing else. There is not any right to exclude other fishermen because the littoral ownership desires that they shall have the sole occupation of fishing.

They must find, then, in the description of these treaties something besides geography before nations are to be concluded by concession of the high seas unless they can find some principle or other in which the seas themselves were locus in quo, are determinable and separable from the right to fish and the right to enjoy as a part of the high seas.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator yield to me right there?

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I beg to ask the Senator from New York if, while he is discussing this most interesting topic of debate, he will give us his conclusions in regard to the definition which Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State and engaged in this very subject-matter, made of the word "bay," to wit:

> A bay, is as usually understood, is an arm or recess of the sea entering from the ocean between capes or headlands, and the term is applied equally to large and small tracts of water thus situated.

Mr. Webster at that time being engaged in an investigation of this very treaty of 1818. I hope I have not interrupted the line of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. EVARTS. Not a bit. Mr. Webster took precisely the same view that I have advanced here, that geographies and maps may call great areas of water "bays," but in the question of expropriation from the high seas and appropriation to the advantages of ports and bays and harbors when you are dealing with a demarkation between the high seas and their engagement with the appropriation to the greater needs, it is not the greater needs of fishing, but it is the greater needs of land occupation and of land subordination of these inlets of the high seas. "Bay" is to be treated in the treaty of 1818 and in the treaty of 1783 on the principle of nascitur à sociis, bays, harbors, ports, creeks; and now we are told that this is to run clear out all over the seas whenever anything by a geographer or a map-maker has been called a bay which is an area of the high seas. This course of argument, if it is to be used, would include Baffin's Bay and Hudson's Bay, and the Bay of Biscay for aught I know. No, when we are are dealing with a nation friendly in participation and friendly therefore in demarkation it follows that what by the law of nations is the theory and principle, and that is of deference, whenever you set up that for shore occupation, you are to convert these inlets of seas into a subordination to the land. Then we give it up for uses of the high seas, but you do not get a condition or a privilege or a power to extend your appropriation of use of the high seas to exclude us from ours.

There can not be found anywhere any principle in the law of nations that allows a nation to extend its privileges of the land occupation because it wants a larger and larger share of the high seas for the use of its people. A definition has been given, so far as it can be given, on so large a subject. The very largest interpretation of bays under the treaty of 1783 and the treaty of 1818 is what is embraced by the land, and does not remain therefore a part of the high seas. That is what it means, and a friendly nation, the nation of Great Britain, when brought to face that proposition, will never hold that by the law of nations one nation can enlarge its possessions of fishery or anything else on the high seas, unless the concession is made of retirement for deference that the greater occasion to your nation makes the land dominant over this adjacent sea and we abandon it for that purpose.

Now, Mr. President, I am able to present, fortunately, not a case arising not in connection with these shores or waters, but a case of the greatest importance arising in the courts of Great Britain, and then followed by a statute of right. (Ch. 73, 41 and 42 Vict.)

This case may have attracted the attention of my friend, the Senator from Delaware, and my friend, the Senator from Alabama; and, fortunately, we find in this reported case not mere speculations, not mere appeals to the unwritten law of nations, and argumentative discrimination between individual appropriations by nations as conceded or as disputed. This case arose in this way: The Franconia, a German ship, sailing within the belt and only distant about 2 miles from the coast of Dover, in the British Channel, by collision with an English ship within that belt, the Strathclyde, not only inflicted injury to the ship itself, but caused the death of several persons on board the English ship. The master of the German ship, the Franconia, was indicted for manslaughter, and was tried and convicted of the offense as being committed, as it was claimed, within the British jurisdiction of the 3-mile belt.

Of course, some questions arose turning upon existing legislation, as a footing for judicial exercise of national jurisdiction, for the courts of every nation are obliged to conform to the political legislation that shall determine that a crime, committed in the place and of the nature, shall be judiciable in a particular court. In the absence, however, of any such political determination, the courts of England were bound to decide whether under the admiralty jurisdiction the criminal jurisdiction established and conceded by the law of nations would take cognizance of and punish the crime perpetrated under the circumstances. There was no doubt but that the court in that case had the full admiralty jurisdiction conferred by the laws of the realm. In the volume which I hold in my hand (L. R. Exch., division 2, page 63), there this question was a reserved Crown case and it was heard by fourteen judges of England. All the great lights of jurisprudence were included on that bench, the lord chief-justice of England, Sir Alexander Cockburn, the lord chief-justice of the common pleas, Lord Coleridge, Phillimore, the admiralty judge, Chief Baron Kelley, and all the famous judges of the king's bench and of the other courts sat in that case, namely, Bramwell, J. A.; Lush and Field, J. J.; Pollock, B.; Brett and Amphlett, J. J. A.; Grove, Denman, and Lindley, J. J.

Judge Archibald, one of the judges, died before the judgment, but he was known to concur with the majority, and when the majority was counted it was found to be a division of 7 and 6. But what was the contention? That there was no such thing as proprietorship in that belt of the sea on the high seas within one marine league of the coast measured from low water-mark and that the concession of the law of nations governing this 3-mile zone was a concession of deference proceeding on the principles that I have ventured to illustrate, and that that was properly described, as publicists describe it, "Linea de respectu" that the limit and extent, though measured for 3 miles, was not a concession of a rightful interference with navigation as an ordinary disturbance of the occupation and pursuit of navigation within the 3 miles, but that it was limited to these principal points which I have suggested of the 3-mile zone for purposes of defensive protection to the shores, in preclusion of belligerent occupation of that space, and of preservation of the littoral fisheries against intrusion. But there was no pretension that by the law of nations this belt of 3 miles, eo nomine, and by that concession was anything more than the ribbon, as it were, drawn along the shores with all their sinuosities. No question arose, no question was disposed of as to what concession could be applied or could be found, except by explicit convention as to rights inside of harbors and bays on the principle I have alluded to.

A nation has no right to exclude foreign nations from the enjoyment of the high seas anywhere except by that concession of deference to the occasions of one power just as properly might be required of another under similar circumstances. The question of deferential concession is not what it ought to be; the question is, what was by the law of nations and had been accepted. In respect of belligerency and in respect of fishing, the 3 miles belt drawn along the shores was the only rule that has ever been by a consensus of nations laid down.

Lord Cairns, then lord chancellor, considering this a very grave decision, important to British interests, and, therefore, quite important to foreign interests, too, brought in a bill not long after for the action of Parliament on the subject, which in due course was passed.

Let me call particular attention, then, to this, the only parliamentary imperial law on the subject of designation and demand of extension of peculiar privileges on littoral waters of the high seas. This is chapter 73, of 41 and 42 Victoria. This proceeds to extend this jurisdiction of punishment, and the only point interesting to us is to ascertain how far this imperial assertion proposed for foreign nations to consider and itself thought right to go. By this act of Parliament the jurisdiction of the admiralty, for the purpose in view, is described, and then the operative clause of the act proceeds:

"The territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions," in reference to the sea, means such part of the sea adjacent to the coast of the United Kingdom, or the coast of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions as are deemed by international law to be within the territorial sovereignty of Her Majesty; and for the purpose of any offense declared by this act to be within the jurisdiction of the admiral, any part of the open sea within 1 marine league of the coast measured from low-water mark shall be deemed to be open sea within the territorial waters of Her Majesty's dominions.

Here, then, we have an explicit statement by an imperial statute of what the law of nations is supposed to concede in regard to the strip of the high sea.

This provision extends to all the possessions of the United Kingdom all over the world, and is an assertion here of a right to apply penal provisions on foreign vessels within the 3-mile limits. But, mark, this authority was not set forth as a right and power to be exercised as other criminal jurisdictions are, proprio vigore, by mere force of indictment and appeal to judicial authority. It is expressly provided, in restraint of any such conclusion, that—

Proceedings for the trial and punishment of a person who is not a subject of Her Majesty, and who is charged with any such offense as is declared by this act to be within the jurisdiction of the admiral, shall not be instituted in any court of the United Kingdom, except with the consent of one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and on his certificate that the institution of such proceedings is in his opinion expedient, and shall not be instituted in any of the dominions of Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, except with the leave of the governor of the part of the dominions in which such proceedings are proposed to be instituted, and on his certificate that it is expedient that such proceedings should be instituted.

It was not an assertion of complete authority over the crime, but it so asserted only with the qualification that no such course of law should be taken without the approval of one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state or the governor-generals in other of her dominions of the world. That this should not be done, we can readily conceive, until the government itself concluded that it was a case of jurisdiction and of enforcement of authority that should be subject to the concessions that should be made under the laws of nations by the foreign power.

For instance, if on board an American ship a murder should be committed while it was sailing within 3 miles of the British dominion in any part of the world, and then that ship should pursue its navigation and bring its burden of witnesses and accused to the courts of this country, where we would have full jurisdiction under our Constitution and our laws, can it be pretended that if an indictment should be found in a British court a demand would be made against this Government for a surrender of the criminal under the extradition treaty of 1842?

This statute, considering it as stopping short, both in area and in demand, as I have stated it, has gone too far and too fast, probably, for the concessions of foreign nations. Whenever a case shall arise the cautionary provisions of this statute require that the peremptory course of law shall not take place until one of the principal secretaries of state shall consider it and thus bring the government face to face with a foreign nation before that government should undertake to execute that law against the subject of a foreign jurisdiction.

Nor would this country ever tolerate, in my opinion, such an execution of criminal law upon a citizen of the United States for a crime happening on an American ship sailing within 3 miles of the coast of Dover or any other part of the United Kingdom.

I have dwelt upon this case, and the consequent legislation, Mr. President, as the best result and deliberate examination of the true scope and meaning of this vague notion of recession from its rights on the high seas that one nation makes in deference to littoral proprietorship. Now I will say a word about bays and harbors. I have described them sufficiently. I have alluded to what has been brought up here in debate, whether the Delaware Bay or the Chesapeake Bay or this or that bay or inlet upon our shore is by the law of nations accessible by foreign nations, or whether they can be excluded therefrom. The principle I have laid down is adequate for all our harbors and all our inlets.

We claim that on the seas between the capes of the Delaware there is a shore occupation, a commerce, a prevalence of land interests, and of trade and of custom laws, and all that marks a shore occupation by our populations, which make it impossible that we should allow the course of these uses of the bay to be treated as still open, at will, to general and equal use of all nations as of the high seas.

We claim that the waters of this bay are embraced within the land, held inter fauces terræ, and the foreign nations concede it, if it seems reasonable to them; and if it does not seem reasonable to them, then they raise the question about it and try conclusions with us, and upon reconsideration, if we still insist upon that authority, undoubtedly it would be conceded.

I wish Senators would bring themselves back to these seas and these shores, at the date of the treaty of 1783 and of the treaty of 1818, nay, even to the littoral possessions as they are now occupied by the since expanded populations of the Provinces. I beg you to understand that we are not kept out of "a bay" under the descriptive "bay" of the geographer or the map-maker. In other words, there has been no appropriation by that mere name and description of the waters in question to the purposes of the interests of the land. What under heaven is there to affect the question of fishing within this bay, Egmont Bay [indicating on the map]? There we have 17½ miles from one imaginary "jaw" of the land to the other "jaw" of the land, the intervening water open to the storm, a wide reach to invite the tempest and not to protect people against it.

Now, upon the headland question, since I am here at the map. Here was our partition wall [indicating]. That is a harbor, a bay in the sense of harbor or shelter, of expropriation from the high seas. Draw a line from this point to that [indicating]. There is another [indicating]. It is a harbor. It is a little one.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator give the names as he indicates the points, so that the reporter may take them down?

Mr. EVARTS. That is Mira Bay. [Indicating.] Here is the great Fortune Bay. [Indicating.] Here are the fishing waters of that bay. [Indicating.] Here is a bay on these lines. [Indicating.] There is shore population. [Indicating.] Does that mean custom-house and trade to be protected? No; the pretension is to draw lines that shall diminish our fishing rights on the high seas, in order that they may enlarge their own area of exclusive possession of the high seas.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from New York call the waters of Fortune Bay the high seas?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes; everything is the high seas below low-water mark, and our fishing rights are still ours outside 3 miles seaward below low-water mark.

Mr. GRAY. Do you call the waters of the Chesapeake Bay the high seas?

Mr. EVARTS. I have considered that subject.

Mr. GRAY. I know. I only ask if you do.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not need to go over it again.

Mr. GRAY. All right.

Mr. EVARTS. It is high sea down to low-water mark. That is what it is, and that is what the statute of 41 Victoria says, and that is what the nations say. The question is, therefore, whether a nation by littoral occupation and its just occasions shall encroach upon the high seas, and whether another nation having rights on the high seas shall retire therefrom.

I shall call attention now to the opinions that were given by the law officers of Great Britain as to what the extent of our exclusion was under the treaty of 1818. We are here brought face to face to what the "headland" contention is and out of what it sprung. It is illustrated very well on the crescent shape of this northern coast of Prince Edward Island. [Indicating.] The proposition of a headland line there [indicating] is so absurd that nobody has ever been able not to understand its absurdity. The fewer headlands you find the larger the area of the high seas from which we would be excluded. This is a good illustration, and in principle a fair one, of the provincial claim. [Indicating.] The distance is nearly a hundred miles, perhaps, between these so-called headlands. [Indicating.] What are called headlands? Headlands that hug and embrace a harbor, fauces terræ, that conquer and inclose and imprison the high seas? Then we extend this chord from headland to headland, and we have 30 miles of high seas distance from the subjacent coast from which we are thus to be excluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have made a claim on that very point, the shore of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. EVARTS. Nobody could claim this headland theory with a grave face. I have never heard it resounding across the ocean from Great Britain that when along the coast they had no intervening harbors, there was a reach to be taken from headland to headland to inclose the high seas as a mare clausum. Read the statute-book of Great Britain that I have read and see whether there is any pretension anywhere of British dominion over such an area of fishing waters as that, or of an interpretation that would give to the use of the word "headland" such an inclusion.

If this inclusion is to be made it is to be made because it is a harbor or a port or a bay. Is that a bay [indicating]? They can thus make bays anywhere, and if you have your headlands a thousand miles apart then you would on this pretension close the whole sea under the claim of bays, harbors, havens, ports, creeks. What a monstrous proposition!

Now, apply this headland claim to Cape Smoke and Point Aconi and St. Anne Bay, as if there was to be found a "bay, harbor, or port," in the sense of the treaties. Is there any place here to enter and escape the storm? Why did they not draw the line there? What is the reason? The theory would carry it there. If they have a right to do so, very well; but there is nothing in the treaty that can indicate it. Here is where the Argus was seized [indicating].

Mr. GRAY. Where was that?

Mr. EVARTS. Here at the other side of that point [indicating].

Mr. GRAY. Would the Senator object if I showed exactly where? A friend to whom I showed the chart fixed just the position of the Argus as shown in the affidavit.

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly not.

Mr. GRAY. About on a line from that point [indicating] to that [indicating] on the bank of St. Anne, and not in St. Anne Bay. That is how confusion was made.

Mr. EVARTS. We will not dispute about it in interruption of my current of observation. The only witness that I have read says it was about 15 miles from land.

Mr. GRAY. Twenty-three.

Mr. EVARTS. Did he say 23?

Mr. GRAY. I think so.

Mr. EVARTS. He said it was 15, I think, and he said that that was not within the bay, and the boarding officer said it was within 3 miles outside of that 15-mile line. It is not a pleasant thing for a fisherman to have to draw a line between two water lines, one 15 miles from the land and one 18 miles from the land, and have confiscation proceed upon any fault in the discrimination. These are sufficient illustrations from the map. I shall remark upon these, what I must consider as purely fictitious lines, when the treaty is taken up in detail.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from New York will pardon an interruption, as of course he wants to be accurate.

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I have in my hand a copy of an affidavit of the crew of the Argus, taken from the files of the State Department, and this is the affidavit of the captain:

We were at the time of the capture 28 miles—

I said 23—

We were at the time of the capture 28 miles from the nearest land, both by our charts and the charts of the Queen's attorney in Halifax. Cape Smoke was the nearest land, bearing west and northwest 28 miles distance. We were on the line between Cow Head and the North Cape of Cape Breton Island.

That is where I got my idea. I knew the Senator would like to have it stated exactly.

Mr. EVARTS. It does not affect my argument in the least.

Mr. GRAY. Not at all, but I think you would like to be accurate about the facts.

Mr. EVARTS. Now, let us look at the learned English lawyers, the espousers and advocates of the "headlands." As I said, they are not in the treaty anywhere. These were mere inventions of the Provincials in order to enlarge the area of their exclusive fishery, and a reduction of our fishing waters under the law of nations, as well as the treaties. This intrudes upon the deep-sea fishing. This is the region covered by the high seas in every sense, outside of harbors, outside of 3 miles, and mere invention of headlands to usurp upon the open seas. Does any one pretend now that, in our discussions with the United Kingdom, we are to be led upon a pretension that the headlands are to embrace the high seas, the area to be wholly determinable by the shape of the coast and the distance between the headlands? I should think not.

Now, let us see what all this pretension rests upon, in the opinion of these learned law advisers of the British Government on the other side of the sea. A formal "case" was submitted, and a formal disposition of every question was given by the law advisers of the British Government. Listen, now, to the responses of these jurisprudents on the "bay" question:

Except within certain defined limits—

That is, geographical limits—

Except within certain defined limits, to which the query put to us does not apply, we are of opinion that by the terms of the treaty American citizens are excluded from the right of fishing within 3 miles of the coast of British America; and that the prescribed distance of 3 miles is to be measured from the headlands or extreme points of land next the sea of the coasts, or of the entrance of the bays—

That is, the headlands of the bays. You can not make a bay by finding headlands; you must identify headlands as purtenant to a bay. If you can find headlands out of which to make bays over night, then you can have them created at the will of all littoral proprietors—and not from the interior of such bays or inlets of the coast, and consequently that no right exists on the part of American citizens to enter the bays of Nova Scotia, there to take fish, although the fishing, being within the bay, may be at a greater distance than 3 miles from the shore of the bay—

Now comes the reason, and that proposition of the law officers rests upon nothing but the following reason that they give. Let me read it:

As we are of opinion that the term "headland" is used in the treaty to express the part of the land we have before mentioned, excluding the interior of the bays and inlets of the coasts.

No lawyer, no court has ever undertaken to construe our treaties, as they read, as having any reference to headlands either of bays or of headlands at large. The whole argument is, you can not fish inside the bays within 3 miles from shore, because the "use of the term 'headland' in the treaty" marks the line of demarkation. Has anything happened since in the way of law, in the way of statutes, in the way of interpretation, that has not been based upon this bold assumption that the term "headland" was used in the treaty of 1818?

Before leaving entirely this imperial statute I ought to say that when this bill was passing in the House of Lords Lord Cairns was asked whether this otherwise disposed of the question of jurisdiction in bays. An admiralty officer, the Duke of Somerset, I think, asked if it touched a crime committed on board a national vessel, a war vessel. The lord chancellor replied, "Neither of those subjects is touched." That is true. There has never been such an attempt by general legislation outside of the 3-mile belt, and I apprehend it will be a long while with the intercommunication introduced between great commercial nations before the British Parliament will undertake to say what are bays in the sense of expropriation of the high seas outside the 3-mile belt and appropriation to the land. Every case is to arise upon its own merits, and the nation that is exterior to the power that exerts this authority and this pretension stands in the forum of nations just as free and just as rightful in its denial of its being a bay within the deference that these principles apply. But unquestionably the 3-mile belt of the statute of 41 Victoria follows into all the sinuosities of the coast, including all indentations of every nature all over the world.

Mr. President, I have said all that I need to say of what I consider the relation under the treaty and under the conduct between the two nations, Great Britain and the United States, of the mere fishery rights, until I come to an examination of the present treaty that is before us.

We have a proposed treaty with Great Britain, not with the Provinces as you see, although the Provinces as a part and an important part of Great Britain come in for a share on the subject. We have great interests with Great Britain besides the fisheries, and those are the commercial rights, commercial privileges, commercial hospitalities, commercial equality, and that deference between nations which enables them to treat politically what shall be their pretensions and not be submitted to treaty.

We are constitutionally in our habits repugnant to treaties. No good comes of encroaching upon our customs laws and duties by entangling treaties—none whatever. Let us govern, let Great Britain govern, let every other nation govern its own interior arrangements of trade. Let it mark its own hospitalities. Let it mark its own duties. Let it mark its own deference to the rights of others. We will do the same for ourselves, too. That is the way to conduct politically these relations of commerce, of hospitality, of deference, of self-respect, of impartial treatment.

That is the great subject outside of the fishery, but when this prevalent and extending hospitality of trade has reached everything except our fishing vessels and our fishermen, when it has included and embraced every fishing vessel and every fisherman of Great Britain in this extension of commercial reciprocity and commercial hospitality, it is said that by virtue of the clauses of the treaty of 1818 and the treaty of 1783 we have covenanted forever that fishermen are outside of progressive hospitality, pretending that covenant proscription for this gallant and favored pursuit and all who pursue it can not be ameliorated. They would say that when all others may warm themselves in the hospitality that is wide open to commerce all over these shores, with the United States to everybody else, we have covenanted our fishermen to be outside of that progress, and we must submit to it.

The covenant was not of proscription, not of exclusion. All commercial relations excluded everything but the fishermen, and they were expressly allowed what was meant to be, and what should have been, insisted upon from the beginning, hospitality to them according to the whole reach that they needed or desired qua fishermen.

The difficulty was that they were not so much afraid that these fishing vessels and fishermen would have the means of buying there. There was nothing to sell nor anybody to sell to them for the most part, and there was no local interest to exclude a traffic that would bring money for what they had to sell. The trouble was that the imperial power excluded all importation, and that these fishing vessels, having this hospitality as extensive as their fishing needs, should not, in the refusal of all other commercial admission, be the means of smuggling and bringing there to sell tobacco or spirits or any of those items that the United Kingdom intended to preserve for revenue purposes.

Senators will understand what a difference there was between fishing facilities and commercial traffic. All these shores were only occupied and defended for fishing purposes. If they let the fishermen, with any allowance of trade, come in, then where are their custom-houses, where are their revenue officers, where is their possible means by which they can keep us from smuggling and encroaching upon the revenues and breaking over the colonial policy of Great Britain?

Obedience on our part was rightfully claimed upon this reason and was properly yielded by us. All we wanted was hospitality in our fishing interests. The interdict of trade was universal and inexorable, and there was no ground for an exception in favor of the fishermen. But when the interdict of trade was withdrawn and trade rushed in, when you invite it everywhere and have your custom-houses and your revenue system and want to make revenue out of it, why can not a fishing vessel, with "touch and trade" privileges from its government, trade like the rest? We give this facility on our shores everywhere to foreign fishermen under similar circumstances.

That is the proper situation of whether or not we should be satisfied with these restrictions, these proscriptions, these oppressions, these harassing and insolent exclusions, under a covenant it is said, that should inexorably ostracize our fishermen when the ports were opened to everybody else.

I wish now to allude to fishing vessels and to the fisheries in their interests and values as profits and as pursuits.

There are three elements requisite in the prosperity of the fishery—in the prosperity of this fishery.

One is the fishing waters, as being the habitat and the resort of fishes that are objects of pursuit. A "fishery" without fish, waters without fish, are not a fishery, although you may have a right to fish there.

The next element is of the relation of shores to those waters. The nation that owns the shores has certain advantages in the pursuit of fishing in these adjacent waters, and foreign nations not bounding the fishing waters are at a disadvantage in that respect.

The third element is the market; for nobody catches fish, although the bay is full of them, and although the shore is lined with shelter and protection, if there is no market to consume the fish.

Now, of these three elements, one, the fishing waters, are of common participation between the Provinces and our people, within such lines of limitation as may be, we will say. They are shared with us—we enjoying only such limited access as the treaties allow. But we have the market and they have not. There is the trouble. Markets abroad, common to us both, they really drove us out of by their advantage in uniting the fisheries and the fishing shores, so that they more cheaply could pursue their industries, and what was once an extensive and profitable commerce to our early settlements on our coast—I mean of the West Indies, of Spain, etc.—they could successfully compete with us and drive us out, simply by that advantage. Of this, their advantage, we make no complaint.

Now they wish by treaty to get a concession from us of this third essential dominant element in the circuit of the three—our market. That is what they want. Do we propose to give it to them? If we give it to them we exclude ourselves from the fisheries by the same rule in the long run that we have been excluded from foreign markets in competition. It is not necessary to speculate upon it. It is as plain as the nose on your face. Our fishermen need to make an output of their fishing vessels from our home and distant ports. Our fishermen and outfit plan for a foreign voyage to bring back the fruits of their pursuit in this fishery, the right in which belongs to us. We must bring them home by a returning voyage and we must find a market that is our own.

And thus by completing that circuit of our fishing, and only thereby, we can maintain a competition with the shore fishermen. This industry is not in the condition by which domestic products are protected against foreign importations. We raise these on land at home, near by the market. We have the protection of foreign importations necessary to compete with them (irrespective of the tariff, for I leave that out). But here we have a double voyage upon us—to bring back our fishing—for these Provincials start out laden with the fish, bring it to our free market if they have it, and return laden with commercial trade in our ports.

Why will Senators close their eyes to this peculiar situation of our interests and the enjoyment of our countrymen in this adjacent fishery? Throw in our fishing interests on some principle of equality with those of the Provincials! Why do they not throw in the other items of equality, one of which is that the farmer may go a fishing there, from the plow and from the hayfield, when he sees the fish coming in? What can we do? We may have to wait there for weeks before we catch our fish and then we are dependent on vicissitudes that can not be accurately foreseen or measured.

There, then, is the contention. Let us understand it. The market they wanted. What could they give us for it? Three elements of calculation they had in their hands. One the inshore fisheries that belonged to them, properly described, whatever they may be, and we miss; the interchange of natural products on each side of the line, of equivalent or similar character on each side; that is reciprocity. The third (and it has proved the greatest) is molestation. Those are the three items that they have of exchanging with us in order to get our market. And now we have driven them out of the two elements of equivalent exchanges, from both inshore fishery and from advantages of reciprocity. We have demonstrated to our satisfaction, and probably to the people of the Provinces, that inshore fishery and reciprocity are no longer even makeweights in acquisition of our market. Of these, the three elements of exchangeable equivalents with us, molestation, molestation alone, remains to them.

I must call attention—I will only dwell upon it very briefly—to the very great advantage that we got out of having a tribunal of examination into the value of the inshore fisheries. I will not read from the interchange that passed between the Secretary of State and Lord Salisbury on either the subject of the award or the subject of the Fortune Bay incident. I will ask the permission of the Senate to append to my speech such portions of that correspondence, already open to public inspection and attention, as it illustrates more fully and completely what I will more briefly refer to now. [See Appendix.]

The importance of the ascertainment of the value of the inshore fishery, which was treated as of great value prospectively in the relations of the Provinces with us, was that it disclosed that the inshore fishery was of no appreciable value to us. I mean the inshore fishery in the sense that we claim the line of demarkation between our rights and the inshore fishery, that is, within the 3-mile belt. The investigation proved that. It did not make any difference to us that these arbitrators said it was worth $5,500,000 for twelve years. We paid it. I do not care to more than refer to what accompanied that payment—the notice—given not only in correspondence, but that which accompanied the actual payment of that money, announced that it was not and would not be any criterion whatever of the value of this inshore fishery and could not be so entertained by us in any future negotiation of values.

We proved then, confessedly, on both sides, that the mackerel fishery was the only in-three-miles fishery that was of any value. We proved by varying testimony that we got, as the Provincials would contend, about three-quarters of our mackerel there, inside; by our proofs that we got only one-quarter, but the misery for the Provincials was that when they counted the three-quarters of the mackerel, then the value of that fishery was a bagatelle to us; it was a trifle compared to mere loss of revenue to us by free fish to the Provincials—aside from other disadvantages and disfavors—and that as an exchangeable equivalent in any subsequent arrangements in favor of the Provincials as against our market, it was extinguished; and that conclusion puts the end to any future expectation of that as a make-weight in any future computations of reciprocal advantages between us.

Our fishermen advised the Government, midway in the treaty, that they would wish that the compensation for the twelve years should be paid down for the six years and we let it go, and pass it to the credit of an arbitration, if we should get back our market. There was not a fisherman nor a fishing vessel nor a merchant or dealer that would ever count as appreciable in equivalent this mackerel fishery inside 3 miles, as we construe it.

Another one was to come, a reciprocity in products on this and that line. We tried that for twelve years from 1855 to 1866. We tried it over again from 1871 to 1885 to the extent that it was carried in that treaty, and we made up our minds on that subject—that no profit comes from that interchange. That obliterates that item in the three equivalents, and there is nothing left but molestation; that is, when interest presses, inbred and ingrained in the human nature on that side of the line as well as all over the world.

Mr. President, under this treaty of 1871 we had instruction on another element. That was the Fortune Bay incident. That incident can not very well be belittled. In December, 1877, six years after the treaty of 1871, the fleet of our fishermen, some twenty-one of them, had made up their minds that they would catch herring bait that winter, in order to serve as frozen bait, which they could use in the deep-sea fishery. The herring are better for halibut, even if not for cod. Clam bait does not suit the taste of the halibut as well as it does that of the cod, but the herrings they are fond of. And when our fishermen can not get herring bait they prefer to catch cod and cut up the cod as bait for the halibut.

Now, we went there and had a right to catch fish. What had we done before, during these seven years of right? Why, we bought the bait. There was nothing in our treaty of 1871 that gave us a right to buy bait. There was not found then any emancipation from the constriction of 1783 and of 1818 in respect to buying bait. It stood just as it was—"wood" and "water," that is what it was—and we bought bait year after year of the Provincials and enriched them with their industry of catching herring for bait and selling it to us. Well, in December, 1877, this fishing fleet of ours said to itself, "Let us try whether it is not cheaper for us to catch herring than to continue to buy," and they waited there for three or four weeks before the herring came in. The herring came along on a Sunday—an enormous school of them. Very well. Now was our time. Twenty-one vessels had waited there for some three weeks to get sight of a herring, and, knowing the habits of that fish, they thought the true time to catch herring was when herring came in.

Now, they went in to catch the herring and by the assistance of three or four of these vessels they included in great purse-nets fish enough as bait for all these twenty-one vessels. Now, what happened? The shore neighborhood were not offended at the violation of Sunday. They violated the institution of the Sabbath, and international and national law, and hospitality, and peace, and all the virtues of Christianity and civilization all at once. What was the point then? Not that they could catch these fish on Monday, for they knew that fish were very uncertain in their movements; but, like Demetrius and the silversmith, so jealous for the shrine of Diana, their "craft" was in danger. What was their craft? Selling to us bait that, as insisted, we had no right to buy, and stopping us from fishing for bait, which we had a right to do. That was the incident of Fortune Bay.

The importance of this incident of injury to these fishermen was entirely swallowed up in the grounds of objection taken by Lord Salisbury in his reply to my application for a due consideration of this outrage and for indemnification.

He put it on the ground that our fishermen had broken three Provincial laws, and our Government could have no recovery or recourse for that reason. One was a law, there, that we could not fish on Sunday; another one was that we could not fish within a close season; and another one was that we could not use as large seines as we had used. These were the Provincial arrangements, by local laws.

I struck at the core of it at once—that we had bought the half of a fishery owned by the British Empire, that no Provincial legislation could curb or restrict or diminish our half in fisheries that belonged to the two nations, except by some remission of our rights signed by our treaty-makers.

Mr. GRAY. That is by the treaty of 1871 you mean.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes—any treaty.

Now, I brought Lord Salisbury at last to the concession that they had not the right after any treaty made with us securing our privileges—that they had not the right either by subsequent imperial or provincial legislation to encroach upon our treaty privilege. How would a nation that must pursue a fishery from the outside—that is, a foreign nation with a foreign equipment—submit their participation to be regulated upon the occasions and the interests and the facilities of shore fishermen? We divided the fishery between us, whatever the fishery was, and thereby had a share in it. But this would not have been an equal share if our share was subject to being pared and frittered away by in-shore fishery regulations encroaching upon our foreign privileges.

But as regards previous statutes, the great nation of Great Britain was placed towards us, by the distinction taken by Lord Salisbury, in the predicament that they had sold us an apparent fishery, for which we had paid in gross five and a half millions of dollars and our free market for twelve years, and were to enjoy it burdened under liens and regulations of local legislation.

I rejected this as an inadmissible interpretation, and the distinction between prior and subsequent legislation will not stand examination for a moment. However this may be, if, ex concessu, the then new treaty of ours could not be invaded after 1871 by imperial or local legislation, then our rights under the treaty of 1818 can not be invaded by imperial or provincial legislation that has taken place since 1818. You can not escape from Lord Salisbury's admission that subsequent local legislation or imperial legislation can not reduce our share and privilege that a treaty has guarantied. And that is the value of the Fortune Bay incident, and it is of such value and importance that I dwell for a moment on that incident, in particular reference that I shall make to one of the articles of the present treaty, which undertakes, for the first time, to submit our neck forever to the yoke of actual and future legislation by the Canadian provinces.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator from New York if Lord Salisbury ever denied the liability of the British Government for that trespass?

Mr. EVARTS. Lord Salisbury sent his final letter just as he was going out of power, just as his ministry was giving place to a Liberal ministry—he delaying it a very long time—and sending his conclusion in reference to which I took the ground that if we were to have a long debate on that subject, we had better be collecting the fish duties in the meanwhile at home.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe his answer was delayed from the time of your letter in January to September, was it not?

Mr. EVARTS. No, I think it was longer than that. April, 1880, was the time of his last letter.

Mr. MORGAN. But the first one, I understand——

Mr. EVARTS. Perhaps you have not looked at the letter of April 3, I think, 1880, which is not in the same connection.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not the letter before me, but I have always understood that, immediately upon your presenting the case of the trespass in Fortune Bay, Lord Salisbury confessed the liability of the British Government for whatever damages had been sustained.

Mr. EVARTS. Lord Salisbury?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. EVARTS. Never; he never admitted a dollar of liability.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, his successor?

Mr. EVARTS. Lord Salisbury said that we were trespassers, had violated the law and should not be heard; that we had bought a fishery burdened with these restrictions and liens. He then went out of office. I reported to the President the result of the British interpretation of our treaty, and that if insisted upon it would be an abrogation; that, in the meanwhile, the $5,500,000 having been paid as the continuous consideration of a free-fish market was being paid, we might as well reimpose our fish duties. Congress was then recommended by the President to take that course, and the British Government by the new ministry, Lord Granville being secretary of foreign affairs, took the matter up promptly and paid the indemnity at the amount settled upon.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from New York will pardon me a moment I desire to get at what I suppose to be the facts in this matter. I notice that in the quotation from a letter of Lord Salisbury in the report made by the honorable Senator, when Secretary of State, to the President, the following language occurs. Lord Salisbury says:

> Her Majesty's Government prefer the view that the law enacted by the legislature of the country, whatever it may be, ought to be obeyed by natives and foreigners alike who are sojourning within the territorial limits of its jurisdiction, but that if a law has been inadvertently passed which is in any degree or respect at variance with rights conferred on a foreign power by treaty, the correction of the mistake as committed, at the earliest period after its existence, shall have been ascertained and recognized, is a matter of international obligation.

Whereupon the then Secretary of State, the present honorable Senator from New York, proceeded to inform the President as follows:

> This dispatch was received by me in November, and on the 23d of the same month the payment of the award of the Halifax Commission was made at the date provided in the treaty. The further consideration of the Fortune Bay claims seemed to require only the verification of the facts on the part of our claimants, so far as they were drawn in question by, or were at variance with, the report made to the British Government by its officers, and the communication to that government of the results as finally insisted upon by us as the basis and measure of our claims.

Mr. EVARTS. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me. An interval passed after that before recourse was had to undertaking to reimpose the fish duties here. The last reply of Lord Salisbury, just as he was going out of power, was, I think, on the 3d of April, 1880, which, the Senator will see, is quite distant from the dates to which he refers.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. EVARTS. But what I desired to say is, that I omitted from this mention of the Fortune Bay incident the details in order to shorten my observations, and have asked permission to include in my remarks what I want to insert. I would like, therefore, not to have to give way to what I would perhaps like to dwell on myself if I were at liberty to do so.

We come then to the consideration of the stage we had reached in the relations, return the two governments and the tenor of diplomatic intercourse up to the time when the new Administration came into power.

Lawyers conversant with maritime collisions, and conversant with the public punishment of crimes at sea, have learned this, that a great proportion of those collisions between vessels, and the mayhems, homicides, and murders on board a ship take place at a time of the change of the watch. There you have the old watch going below and the new watch coming on deck; then is the opportunity, if you are in danger of collision, or if you are exposed to murderous crimes on board—that is the time that lends an opportunity. This Administration had come into power and the Republicans had left the deck and the Democratic authorities had assumed it, and what do we find happens? I say this not in any derogation—I speak of it as a situation—the change from a party that had pursued and conducted these matters up to this point, and its deposit, in a new exercise of authority, in the hands of a new administration.

Immediately the British Government, the Provincials, Lord Granville, Sir Lionel West, and all the susceptibilities of the British nation were aroused to protect our fishermen, and Sir Lionel proposed to our Administration: "Why, don't you see that the time of terminating this treaty is, unfortunately, on the 1st of July, when all these seas will swarm with fishermen?" And our Secretary of State said, "Why, that is so." "Well, now," said Sir Lionel, "we will do this, for this season: We will protect you for six months if you will agree to undertake to enter upon and, so far as your counsel and your policy will go, aid us to get a free market and reciprocity." And so, these poor fishermen, like outcasts from their homes, are to be taken up by the British Government and Lord Granville, and this was done out of express good will to the United States! God help us! Where should we be had we to deal with Great Britain when not with good will and with pity to the forlorn and deserted condition of our fishermen!

Now, what was the fact? Here our fishermen, as I have already pointed out to you, had been praying for six years that this abrogation of the treaty should be reached as soon as possible, throwing in the five million and a half dollars. They were looking with ambition and hope to the time when our right to terminate this arrangement should arrive; and it did arrive; and the President of the United States issued a proclamation six months before the 1st of July, giving notice to every fisherman and every fish-vessel owner, to every trader, to every merchant, that the fishing duties on foreign fish came into play the 1st of July. And they prayed day and night to hasten the day. For when they caught anything after the 1st of July they had a market.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether, while he was Secretary of State, he ever made any overtures to the British Government to dispense with the treaty of 1871?

Mr. EVARTS. I communicated directly, in estimating the value of our fisheries and our interests, the fact that we should be willing to terminate it at that halfway period and throw in the award for the whole.

Mr. MORGAN. And they declined to do it?

Mr. EVARTS. They did not listen to it. I put it argumentatively of course. They knew very well what they would do.

Mr. MORGAN. Were there no means within the reach of the administration of President Hayes by which he could have got rid of this serious incumbrance on the fishery right of our people?

Mr. EVARTS. None except to denounce the arrangement.

Mr. MORGAN. He did not denounce it.

Mr. EVARTS. No, he had no right or power to do so. We had made a treaty and we had to stand up to it, and we did. We paid every way; we were bleeding at every pore in our interests; no counterpoise but the one-quarter or one-half of the mackerel catch inside 3 miles; that was all. When it came to the first opportunity we terminated it.

I have said that there was solicitude on the part of Sir Lionel West, Lord Granville, the British Government, and the Provincial population because of the forlorn condition which these Yankee fishermen would be in when the 1st of July should come. But these Yankee fishermen were there so as to be ready to catch, on the 1st of July, fish that had a market for them—a market that was restored to them by the termination of the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I think I shall be able before the debate closes to furnish very strong evidence of an earnest request made to this present Administration for the extension through that fishing season of the privileges of the treaty of 1871.

Mr. HOAR. From whom?

Mr. MORGAN. From the fishermen; from those men engaged in fishing on the New England coast, and from there up to the British waters.

Mr. EVARTS. There was no public demonstration of a stress that we were under.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I will produce resolutions to show that also, public demonstrations.

Mr. EVARTS. Well, Yankees are ready, of course, to take both sides of the bargain if they can. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAY. That is it. You have struck it there.

Mr. EVARTS. And if they got the fishery treaty at an end, and the fishing duties on the provincials, and then they could fish without molestation, they would be all right, for, as I pointed out, molestation was all that was meant by the provinces. All these fishermen, when I had the conduct of foreign affairs, on my consulting with them, deliberately said they would like to terminate the fishery privilege midway, notwithstanding the $5,500,000.

Mr. MORGAN. Is that correspondence on file in the Department?

Mr. EVARTS. Oh, I do not know how much would be found in letter and how much in consultation. At any rate it was sufficient for me to act upon.

Mr. MORGAN. I only wanted to know if I could get access to it.

Mr. EVARTS. It was not an authority that I could cite now.

I am reminded of what I should not have omitted, that this action of the President was called forth by the announcement of the vote of both Houses of Congress behind his proclamation, and yet these foreign guardians of our fisheries, fishermen, and interests, thought that this nation was asleep and they thought that the 1st of July was expected to happen, I suppose, about the middle of December, and that there was need of this succor.

Now, what happened? There was nothing in this repose or in the need of this repose except as an entering wedge, a hold of good feeling, of protection on the part of Great Britain, to get at our market. That is what they were at, and the Administration accepted and entered into that conciliation, and was accorded and accepted, on our side, upon the proposition of undertaking to produce, so far as the policy and the rightful authority of the Administration could, reciprocity and free fish. There is no denying that. Read the papers.

In the mean while, the matter having proceeded thus far, a communication was made by the Executive to Congress of the stage that had been reached, and that he desired a commission appointed to take up, entertain, and execute, it might be, this benevolent disposition that was opened to us by Great Britain. The answer was of entire respect but of unequivocal import: "We do not wish a commission at all; we do not desire to enter into these subjects, and it is delusive and disrespectful to Great Britain to hold out a commission that is to accomplish results such as are there foreshadowed when we have no design or purpose of favoring such a result."

But this was persevered in. Our answer, then, went further. There is one province that is not to be arranged, nor is the true province of arrangements between two great nations by diplomatic correspondence or by treaty. That is to be cared for by political action of nation toward nation, and that is by legislation concerning that equality, that freedom, that largeness, that advantageous liberality of commerce, of hospitality, of deference, of respect, of nurture and culture of interests, and not of proscription and disfavor and tentative or approaching extirpation.

Has not the Congress of the United States a right to say that commercial relations may be treated politically between nations? They shut out all the commercial rights and all the privileges and all the liberalization of shelter, and "coal" instead of "wood," and all things of that nature, and said: "Well, let all those go under one head, now that the fishery business must stand on its own bottom. In regard to that there is nothing in the equivalent that the provinces can offer in the fishing interchange of any value, and we do not intend that molestation shall be a working asset in the negotiations for our dealing concerning these fisheries." That was the answer on that point.

But, nevertheless, the Administration proceeds. It does not propose to us a reconsideration as to whether we will tolerate a commission, by saying to us, "the President has considered, notwithstanding what Congress has said, that the Government ought to enter into a negotiation"—a course which the President had doubtless a right to take—"and he proposes to you a commission, and nominates certain participants in that commission." Then the question would come up whether we would confirm or would not confirm the nominations. Would any one question the ability or the virtues of these commissioners by refusing to confirm them?

We would merely say, "We do not desire a commission." Had we not a right to do that? Meanwhile, the President, with the accredited and responsible officers, the Secretary of State and the minister at the court of St. James's, had a right to conduct the treaty without any consultation with us. I do not touch the question whether or not there could be properly included commissioners without official title and responsibilty and recognition under the Constitution.

I only say that it was not disrespectful to the Executive for the two Houses of Congress to announce their propositions for the treatment of the situation between Great Britain and us, and the substance of that was that we will treat politically the question of equality of hospitality and equality of rights; and if you propose to go into diplomatic negotiations on the other subject, of a free market here; we have made up our minds to the contrary; our people have made up their minds; they have had sufficient experience and they are all of one mind—yes, all, so far as concerns the fisheries themselves and the free market.

If you find advantage in feeding the hungry and in patronizing foreign fishermen for that purpose, that is another matter; but in the interest of our fishermen and our fisheries, our people have made up their minds and I see no change in them. I have no fear that under the exploration given to this subject of the fisheries and of the dependence of our fair share of that great possession, on the score of the need of our market to put us on an equality with the Provincial fishermen, I have no fear that free fish will ever play a part in our system here.

It is but fair that I should indicate what I suppose might be a proper line of interchange of views between these Governments in regard to this subject of molestation. We should insist upon what our rightful claims are, that we have always rejected the headland theory, that we do not tolerate the right to make a bay by calling it a bay, thus taking a part out of our fisheries and transferring it to theirs, and we do insist on the 3-mile line and its sinuosities, and we would like now to know, if Great Britain objects to it, what its claim is. That being ascertained, then there may be or may not be an opportunity of finding out what the treaty of 1818 meant; and what that means we desire to adhere to.

But if that were not proper, then our rights and their rights must go on as before—not with war, not with fear of war, but with irritation, and perhaps in the presence of patroling ships of war, not to fight one another, but to protect each interest. And then the question must take the course of solution, not of hostilities, but when the aggregate was important enough, but when it was pressing enough, to have a mixed commission to decide, as every valuable judgment in political junctures, as well as in private law, is decided, by a decision upon incidents when they arise.

When our demand, or their demand, shall meet with resistance, then it is to be provided for, as these nations are always providing for incidents in their intercourse as occasions arise. I do not mean by choosing occasions of disadvantage, but as any occasions in fact arise. How many cases have there been of complaints with Mexico, complaints with Spain, complaints with France, complaints with England? War! Has any nation ever declared war against the United States? We have been a nation a hundred years. Has any nation of the earth declared war against us? We once declared war against Great Britain to maintain our right to be neutral, but no nation has declared war against us.

Nothing in the system of our civilization and of our commerce and of our amity with all the great nations of the globe tolerates, even in the area of irresponsible debate, an agitation of any such question as that. Mexico, Congress decided by its act, was at war with us, and we took up the quarrel at that stage. We did not declare war against Mexico, but treated it as coming about by acts which made it war. Mexico had not declared war; we did not declare war; but finding one subsisting we thought we would carry it on, and we did.

But the point I make is that no nation has ever declared war against the United States. Where does this talk about war come from? War is a very wide area. War has very extensive weapons; war has losses; war has exposures; war has resentments; war has interruptions of commerce; war has scouring the seas; war has intercepting food for the machines and food for the people who tend the machines. What attack can be made upon us? Who expects to make a footing on our territory, by a hostile fleet to wrest any portion of our territory from us? What profitable intercourse, filling the pockets of all the great nations of Europe desires to cut off our market, although it climbs over a tariff? It is the best market, though climbing over our tariff, for Great Britain anywhere.

I would not introduce such a topic as this for all the world. It finds no place here. I can not understand why it is interposed in this peaceful consideration as to whether we find a proposed treaty acceptable or not acceptable. What is the casus belli? While we are proposing to go under the treaty of 1818, it would present a very extraordinary casus belli, that we will not make a new treaty, that we think the treaty as it comes down to us with all the explanations it has received in the past is better than a new treaty that has manifold the difficulties in it compared with that we have had seventy years to interpret as the existing one. Is that a casus belli? It might be a casus belli against China when that Empire would not make a treaty to let in opium, but I do not think it is a casus belli that we wish to adhere to a treaty that is seventy years old, and not to make a new one. Away, then, with any such proposition of umbrage or resentment on the part of Great Britain.

If you want to undertake a course of diplomatic understandings and conventions about the protection of fishing on each side of this line between us, why not do as the English have done with the French in their competing fishing? Cape St. John is not noted on the map before us, but Cape St. John is at this headland on the east coast of Newfoundland [indicating]. The outer headland there is Cape St. John. The French fishing goes up north, turns the point, and comes down on the west coast to Cape Ray. France and Great Britain in dealing with those fishery arrangements are face to face to one another across the Straits of Dover.

Let me ask attention to what is very interesting, the convention which was concluded between France and Great Britain concerning the Newfoundland fisheries November 14, 1885. There were the fisheries and there were these nations, and there was a treaty arrangement to which I shall call your attention to see what was provided; how important it was, when it was worth while, to understand that the enjoyment of fishery rights depended upon their administration, upon their impartial administration, between two nations, and not by unilateral supervision and regulation. I shall not read all of these articles, but following the "arrangement" so called which I read, I will call attention to some points in various articles.

The undersigned commissioners, delegated by the Governments of France and Great Britain, to the end of seeking—apart from the treaties now in force which they are not authorized either to modify or to interpret—

You got down to the point of how the competing interests are to be administered—the means of preventing and settling differences relative to the use of the fisheries on the coasts of Newfoundland, have drawn up by common accord, under reserve of the approbation of their respective governments, the following engagements.

Here are articles, twenty in number, providing various regulations.

ARTICLE I.

The Government of Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland engage to conform to the hereinafter expressed provisions for assuring to French fishermen, in the execution of existing treaties and particularly the declaration of 1783—

For they had a subsisting treaty of that date—

the free exercise of their industry upon the coasts of Newfoundland without hinderance or obstacle of any kind on the part of British subjects.

Observe, now, these regulations do not either change or interpret the treaties, but the occasions of complaint and of difference are to be provided for. These are very explicit, and I call the attention of the Senate to all of them. There are some of them, more important than others, that I should like to read—that is, more important to our present situation.

ARTICLE IV.

It is agreed that the French shall retain, to the fullest extent, upon all that part of the coast comprised between Cape St. John and Cape Ray, and as it is defined by the treat es, the right to take, dry, and cure fish, as well as the right to cut, anywhere save in inclosed properties, the wood necessary for their drying-stages, cabins, and fishing vessels.

ARTICLE V.

The surveillance and police of the fisheries shall be exercised by vessels of the military marine of the two countries, under the conditions hereinafter laid down the commanders of the cruisers having, under these conditions, sole authority and competence in all matters concerning the fisheries and the operations pertaining thereto.

It is not the courts on shore; it is this police regulation exercised by the public vessels of the two powers. Then—

ARTICLE VIII.

The cruising vessels of the two countries shall be competent to ascertain any infractions of existing treaties, particularly of the declaration of 1783, by the terms whereof the British subjects shall not "interrupt in any manner, by their competition, the fishery of the French during the temporary exercise of it which is granted to them, upon the coasts of the Island of Newfoundland.

And so on.

ARTICLE X.

In the event of the natives hindering or molesting on land, by their acts, the drying and curing of fish and in general the diverse operations—

Here is the point—

the diverse operations which depend upon the exercise of the French fisheries on the coast of Newfoundland.

Their right was to fish there, and "the diverse operations" are to be protected. Then a provision is made for the statements, the taking of evidence, and exemption from any taxes; and then—

ARTICLE XVII.

The French fishermen shall have the right to buy bait, herring, and capelin, on land or at sea, in the harbors of Newfoundland, without tax or impediment of any kind, after the 5th of April of each year, and until the end of the fishing season.

That is a line that two great nations can take in hand, and if we are to enter upon the execution of the treaty of 1818, that is the method of proceeding. It will not do for us to be so careless of our rights and interests, and indulgent as we have been. It will not do; it will not be adequate for us merely to say, "We speak the same tongue, and live on the same continent, and are of the same lineage, and of the same institutions, and good neighborhood is of equal importance to both." We now need to have our rights, as we regard them, respectfully treated, until they are adjusted under the law of nations. As I understand it, there is just as good a right for us, if a provincial cruiser undertakes to seize one of our fishing vessels outside of the 3 miles, and the fact so determines it, to treat it as a marine tort, and to visit it upon the marauding vessel, whatever authority it may carry at its masthead. We take the responsibility for it, of course.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator pardon me for an interruption? I hope he will intimate if he has the slightest objection, because I know how fatigued he must be, but it is a simple question. The treaty to which he has just called our attention between Great Britain and France in 1885 refers to the regulation of a common fishery on the western and eastern coasts of Newfoundland. We also have a common fishery regulation with Great Britain on the western and southern coasts of Newfoundland. Has the Senator from New York ever heard of any complaint from any American fisherman exercising that common fishery of being molested or interrupted in his right by the inhabitants or authorities of Newfoundland, because, if he will permit me to add, the questions which we are discussing and to which this treaty refers are not the regulation of common fisheries, but the interpretation of a treaty which excludes us from territorial waters?

Mr. EVARTS. Then the dispute with us is where that line is. That is the point that comes in; and that line is to be patrolled, and that line is to be administered by international regulation, not at the will of the authorities of the shore fishermen.

I thank the Senator, it was no interruption, because it recalls my attention to what I had overlooked and is a part of my argument, and that is the clauses of these French treaties. I call attention to the liberality with which the convention I have commented on recognizes rights which spring out of simple words of the treaty, and are provided for, and the respectful manner in which they are treated.

The treaty of 1713, which is the treaty of Utrecht, and lies at the foundation, provides:

But it shall be allowed to the subjects of France to catch fish and to dry them on land, in that part only, and in no other besides that, of the said island of Newfoundland which stretches from the place called Cape Bonavista to the northern point of the said island, and from thence, running down by the western side, reaches as far as the place called Point Riche.

Those points are not on this map, and it is not important whether they are the Quirpon Islands, and St. John's and Cape Ray or not; but the right is accorded only in those general terms to catch fish and dry them.

By the treaty of 1763, which is the treaty of Paris, it is provided:

V. The subjects of France shall have the liberty of fishing and drying, on a part of the coasts of the island of Newfoundland, such as it is specified in Article XIII of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the present treaty (except what relates to the island of Cape Breton, as well as the other islands and coasts in the mouth and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence). And His Britannic Majesty consents to leave to the subjects of the Most Christian King the liberty of fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence on condition that the subjects of France do not exercise the said fishery but at the distance of 3 leagues.

In the treaty of 1783, between these powers, it is provided:

V. His Majesty, the Most Christian King, in order to prevent the quarrels which have hitherto arisen between the two nations of England and France—

Because quarrels arose—

consents to renounce the right of fishing, which belongs to him in virtue of the aforesaid article of the treaty of Utrecht, from Cape Bonavista to Cape St. John, situated on the eastern coast of Newfoundland, in 50° north latitude; and His Majesty the King of Great Britain consents on his part that the fishery assigned to the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty, beginning at the said Cape St. John, passing to the north and ascending by the western coast of the island of Newfoundland, shall extend to the place called Cape Raye, situated in 47° 50′ latitude. The French fishermen shall enjoy the fishery which is assigned to them by the present article as they had the right to enjoy that which was assigned to them by the treaty of Utrecht.

The point of this, if Senators will allow me, is that under treaty rights, expressed in general terms, the treatment, between these nations of the diverse interests concerning the corroboration and enjoyment of the fishery, when the right is regarded as fixed by the treaty-power conceding it, that power is under obligation to provide an international method of preventing molestation, irritation, and interference. That is the point to which I invoke consideration.

Then we would treat all these matters of hospitality and of commerce politically. That is the position which we are now in. The two Houses of Congress have, with unanimity, agreed upon that course, and have vested the President with the power, politically, to equalize our hospitalities and our privileges on our part with the hospitalities and privileges that are given us on the other side.

Now, Mr. President, I will remark for a moment, before I close, upon the publicity of this debate, which has been made a subject of complaint on the part of our friends, the Senators on the other side of the alley, as leading us into incontinent agitations and discussions that should better be kept in the secrecy of executive session. Of course, it is not easy when Senators on either side of the Chamber pass out of the habits of secret discussions into open debates readily to accommodate the line of open political debate, which we are accustomed to, to that of international considerations, which generally belong to the confidence of one government, not drawing the other into participation. But let us understand how much of complaint can be made against this side of the Chamber on this point of publicity of the British treaty. That is the question.

The President of the United States, in making a confidential communication of the treaty to the Senate, and of his own exposition, by message, of the arguments for its adoption, closed by saying:

I am given to understand that the other governments concerned in this treaty will, within a few days, in accordance with their methods of conducting public business, submit said treaty to their respective legislatures, when it will be at once published to the world. In view of such action it appears to be advisable that, by publication here, early and full knowledge of all that has been done in the premises should be afforded to our people.

It would also seem to be useful to inform the popular mind concerning the history of the long-continued disputes growing out of the subject embraced in the treaty and to satisfy the public interests touching the same, as well as to acquaint our people with the present status of the questions involved, and to give them the exact terms of the proposed adjustment, in place of the exaggerated and imaginative statements which will otherwise reach them.

I therefore beg leave respectfully to suggest that said treaty and all such correspondence, messages, and documents relating to the same as may be deemed important to accomplish these purposes be at once made public by the order of your honorable body.

The Executive took the lead in judging that this British treaty should be brought home to the popular attention, together with the correct appreciation of the previous situation and the conduct of affairs from that point of view. And, now, when the project of the Executive has been imparted to our countrymen, with the solicitous desire that there should be neither misconception nor exaggeration in the public mind, when the alternative and correlative presentation or the discussions of the Senate of what will instruct and inform our countrymen, it is declared an indecency simply because this would involve us in debates that might more properly be kept from such publicity.

Why should not, as a rule, the views of the President have been kept from the public knowledge and the public discussion? What credit can you yield to a complaint that there shall be a unilateral enlightenment for the people of these United States and the opposite opinions and the opposite interpretation shall be withheld and suppressed? It is amazing that an objection of this nature should be raised to the public discussions of the Senate at this stage of the whole matter already laid before the people.

Of course, the Senate is the master of that question; and the Administration Senators are masters for themselves of the question whether the President and the Secretary of State have not told the people enough and they do not need to hear from the other side. Accordingly we, on our side, have full liberty of opinion that this ex parte information and discussion on the part of the Executive is not enough for our people. We propose to them therefore that this debate shall be a free and open communication on the one side and the other of the rights and duties of our people.

Now, one subject further and I am through. The Senator from Alabama has lamented this report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, for I believe it is a report of the committee. It is not a report of a portion of the committee; it is a report of the committee, produced by the major opinions; and the minority report is a report of their individual opinions. Ours is a report of the committee, and it is a report of the organ of the Senate, and to the Senate. Yet it is said there has been an assumption and an arrogance in what we have undertaken to say in behalf of the Foreign Relations Committee. The statement refutes any such imputation.

But a more serious proposition is that the committee have undertaken to commit in advance the Senate and the country, if we reject this treaty, to the proposition that the opportunity for negotiations has passed and can not be renewed. We do not undertake to state anything but what we base upon the conduct of the two Houses of Congress. That is what we report. At pages 24 and 25 of this report, after quoting the communication of the President, under date of 8th December, 1886, to Congress, the committee says:

Justly influenced, doubtless, by this message and by the state of affairs shown in the documents accompanying it and by the evidence taken by, and the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the same subject made on the 19th of January, 1887 (Rep. No. 1683, Forty-ninth Congress, second session), Congress came to the conclusion that the period of negotiation and unavailing remonstrance had passed, and with almost absolute unanimity and without any party division enacted the act of March 3, 1887.

That is the act giving power to the President in the premises. This is the committee's report of what Congress said and did. Is not this deduction open to the debate and the conclusion, and does not every Senator and every Congressman, when that vote was taken, understand that Congress had declared its attitude on this subject, that it did not propose to have a commission or enter into a negotiation; that our attitude of seeking reparation from unappeased resentments was not a subject upon which we wanted to make a new treaty, but of seeing that old treaties were observed, and that the subject of commercial integrity and equality was not to be entered into to obtain de novo and original stipulations that we were to sue for?

Now, on page 35 we say:

No new event or situation of affairs has arisen since that time,

That is March 3, 1887—

and the only real questions subsisting between the two countries in respect of the subject were those of reclamations by the United States for outrages upon its citizens, for which this treaty makes no provision, and the question of whether the mutual arrangements of 1830 and the mutual rights of transit under the treaty of 1871 shall continue.

This treaty makes no provision for an indemnity. It does make provision for establishing forever the full measure and limit of rights and privileges to be enjoyed by fishing vessels of the United States.

But it is said there is an admixture of effrontery and of servility proceeding on another point out of the mouth of the Foreign Relations Committee. On page 38 the committee proceeds:

The committee can not, but hope that if these ill-advised negotiations——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, he has not fully quoted the statement of the committee upon which we rely, that they are trying to commit this country to the proposition that the time for negotiation has passed.

Mr. EVARTS. I have not read everything, I agree. The Senator read the other day what he relied upon.

Mr. MORGAN. On page 34, a full statement of it would show that the committee did take that very ground.

Mr. EVARTS. The Senator read that before. I have referred to those phrases and given my interpretation of them.

This is a combination of effrontery and arrogance, personal, I suppose, on the part of Senators who signed this paper, because the impersonality of the Senate has not committed itself to this effrontery.

Mr. MORGAN. I was speaking of the committee and comparing it with the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and other committees of this body.

Mr. EVARTS. I hope I may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator asked me if it was personal. I say I was speaking of the committee.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes; the five who had signed the report.

Mr. MORGAN. A majority who, you say, represent the Senate.

Mr. EVARTS. Those persons representing personal arrogance, as you say.

Mr. MORGAN. Representing the Senate.

Mr. EVARTS. Now, I will read what the committee says:

The committee can not but hope that if these ill-advised negotiations, which, as is known to all the world, can not properly commit the United States in any degree until they shall have received the constitutional assent of the Senate, shall fail to meet the approval of this body—

Now, in that contingency—not remote, I think, when this was written; certainly not remote now—the committee express the hope—

Her Majesty's Government will take measures to secure justice and fair treatment in her North American dominions to American vessels and American citizens, in all respects and under all circumstances, and that that Government will see the justice and propriety of according to American vessels engaged in the business of fishing all the commercial rights and facilities in her North American ports that are so freely and cheerfully accorded to her own in the ports of the United States, and that thus the friendship and good feeling which ought to exist between neighboring nations may be finally established and secured.

If any fault can be found on either side of the Chamber with an expectation and hope, if this treaty shall fail of consummation, that after that the political relations between this country and Great Britain will be adequate to solve any difficulties between the two nations, if there is anything that is either offensive or servile in sentiment or expression in the language used by the committee, it eludes my appreciation.

Now, Mr. President, I have brought to a close the treatment of the attitude between the two countries and the negotiation, down to this treaty, on which I was prepared to make a comment, and I hope not an unfair comment, on the actual provisions of the different articles of the treaty, but I forbear to proceed——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will yield, I will move to proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. EVARTS. Allow me to conclude my observation. I forbear to proceed at present with that inquiry, and it may be it would not be quite suitable for me to proceed before a vote is taken upon the pending motion of postponement. It may be that a critical examination of these articles may more properly find its place under the examination of the treaty itself on the merits which, if I rightly understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], are to be independently considered, on his part at least, rather than upon the consideration of the postponement of the treaty.

APPENDIX.

Mr. Evarts to Mr. Welsh.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 27, 1878.

SIR: I am directed by the President to present to the attention of Her Majesty's Government the sentiments of this Government respecting the result of the deliberations of the commission lately sitting at Halifax for the determination of the question submitted to it under the articles of the treaty of Washington relating to the fisheries. It is the purpose of the present communication to put you fully in possession of these sentiments, that you may impart them to Lord Salisbury with the same frankness that they are disclosed to yourself.

It is a matter of sincere regret to the President that the actual result of the deliberations of this commission has been such as to require from this Government the course of observation upon the same which it becomes my duty to submit to the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. For reasons of paramount importance to the interests of the two countries, in their future treatment of the subject of the fisheries, a candid statement of the views of this Government, as to the position in which the action of the commission has placed those interests, is due alike to the British Government and ourselves.

Nor are these views expressive only of the sentiments of the executive department of the Government. Upon the papers being laid before Congress, for its necessary action, upon the question of making an appropriation from the Treasury to meet what should prove to be the proper obligations of the Government under the treaty, Congress, with great unanimity, concurred with the Executive in the opinion that the attention of the British Government should be invited to the subject of the award, as looked upon by this Government, in advance of the final action of the Executive in reference to its payment. Accordingly, the sum appropriated by Congress to meet the award is, by the appropriation act, "placed under the direction of the President of the United States with which to pay the Government of Her Britannic Majesty the amount awarded by the Fisheries Commission, lately assembled at Halifax, in pursuance of the treaty of Washington, if, after correspondence with the British Government on the subject of the conformity of the award to the requirements of the treaty, and to the terms of the question thereby submitted to the commission, the President shall deem it his duty to make the payment without further communication with Congress."

The occasion for this correspondence with the British Government arises from the great importance of reaching a complete and explicit understanding between the two Governments as to the conformity of the award made by the commission to the terms of the treaty of Washington, by which its authority and jurisdiction are communicated and defined. If the award in respect of the fisheries had relation only to the sum of the payment involved, considerable as that is, this Government might prefer to waive any discussion which could affect no continuing and permanent interest of the two countries, and would, therefore, comprehend only such considerations as would touch the principles or elements of computation applied by the commission in arriving at a pecuniary amount, the payment of which carried no consequences. It is true, even in such case, the indisputable right of the parties to an arbitration, public or private, to examine an award in respect of its covering only the very matter submitted, should not be too readily relinquished from mere repugnance to question a result which, at least, if undisturbed, serves the good purpose of closing the controversy. If the benevolent method of arbitration between nations is to commend itself as a discreet and practical disposition of international disputes, it must be by a due maintenance of the safety and integrity of the transaction, in the essential point of the awards, observing the limits of the submission.

But this Government is not at liberty to treat the fisheries award as of this limited interest and operation in the relations of the two countries to the important, permanent, and difficult contention on the subject of the fisheries, which for sixty years has, at intervals, pressed itself upon the attention of the two Governments and disquieted their people. The temporary arrangement of the fisheries by the treaty of Washington is terminable, at the pleasure of either party, in less than seven years from now. The fisheries award, upon such termination of the treaty arrangements, will have exhausted its force as compensation for a supposed equivalent and terminated privilege. If this Government, by silent payment of the award, should seem to have recognized the principles upon which it proceeds, as they may then be assumed or asserted by Her Majesty's Government, it will at once have prejudiced its own rights, when it shall become necessary to insist upon them, and seem to have concealed or dissembled its objections to the award, when Great Britain was entitled to an immediate and open avowal of them.

Upon these considerations the President and Congress have required that the sentiments of this Government respecting the fisheries award be set before Her Majesty's Government, to the end that a full interchange of views, in a friendly spirit, between the two Governments, should leave no uncertainty as to the degree of concurrence or of difference in their respective estimates of this transaction.

It is greatly to be regretted that the protocols of the commission make no record of the steps by which the majority reached the conclusion which they announced as the award of the commission, and the dissenting commissioner, on the other hand, arrived at so widely different a result. Had the records disclosed the methods of reasoning, or the processes of calculation respecting either of the privileges which, under the submission of the treaty, were to be measured and compared, upon which the divergent results of their deliberations were reached, the task of exposing the manner and extent in which, in the opinion of the Government, the award transcends the submission of the treaty would be much simpler.

Indeed, in the view which this Government takes of the narrow and well-defined question submitted to the commission by the treaty, and of the indisputable result of the evidence pertinent thereto, there seems little reason to doubt that if the protocols exhibited a trace, even, of the elements of computation by which the two concurring commissioners made up their judgment, they would inevitably disclose the infirmity of the actual award, and make any careful demonstration of the same superfluous.

I desire that you will first call Lord Salisbury's attention to the nature of the question submitted to the Halifax Commission, as adjusted through the diplomatic conferences of the Joint High Commission and expressed in the treaty.

In the first place, the United States, in the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, did not intend to, and did not, waive or curtail in the least the construction of the fishery and appurtenant privileges accorded in the first article of the convention of 1818, as claimed by them, and actually possessed and enjoyed by them under such claim, at and before the negotiation of the treaty of Washington. Neither the protocols of the conferences of the joint high commissioners, nor the text of the treaty negotiated by them, indicate any intention of submitting to the interruption of the Halifax Commission the degree of privilege accorded to the United States by the convention of 1818. On the other hand, it is manifest from the instructions to Her Majesty's high commissioners, as well as from the protocols of the conferences, that a settlement of the disputed interpretation of the convention of 1818 was contemplated as possible only by the diplomatic deliberations of the Joint High Commission, and such conclusions thereon as they might find it in their power to embody in the treaty of Washington.

This task, however, they did not undertake, but provided only for a temporary possessory privilege that should supersede, during its continuance, any determination of such disputed interpretation. In this disposition of the subject, it would seem quite beyond the scope of the jurisdiction of the Halifax Commission to include in any measure of the additional privilege accorded to the United States by Article XVIII of the treaty of Washington, any contribution for the enjoyment of the privileges accorded to the United States by the convention of 1818, as claimed and actually possessed by them at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Washington. A reference to document No. 15, filed with the Halifax Commission, in support of the case of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, and found at page 238 of the Congressional publication of the proceedings of the Halifax Commission will substantiate this proposition.

I do not regard this point of serious importance in the exposition of the subject, except that I desire to preclude, in behalf of the United States, any implication, or argument hereafter, to be drawn from my passing over, without criticism, this possible element in the admeasurement of the award. The United States still maintains its interpretation of the privilege secured by the convention of 1818, and protests against any implication from the magnitude of the award of the Halifax Commission, or otherwise from its proceedings under the treaty of Washington, that the United States have sanctioned or acquiesced in, or by the payment of that award would sanction or acquiesce in, any lesser measure of the privileges secured to the United States under the convention of 1818, than, as is well known to Her Majesty's Government, they have always insisted upon.

In the next place, the United States did not submit to the Halifax Commission, under the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, any valuation of any general economic or political advantages which grow out of access to fishing grounds for the development of a mercantile or naval marine, and which, therefore, it might be argued, would be enhanced by adding the area of the inshore fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the fields for that enterprise, from the earliest period open to and occupied by the bold and hardy seamen of this country. Still less did the United States submit to that commission a pecuniary measurement of the removal of occasions of strife between the fishermen, or misunderstanding between the governments of the two countries, by the temporary obliteration of a restrictive line, dividing the inshore from the deep-sea fisheries on portions of the coast of British North America.

Both of these subjects are considerations, governmental in their nature, suitable to be entertained, with many others, in the diplomatic negotiations which ended in the treaty. They are neither of them computable in money. That which relates to the maintenance of good understanding and good neighborhood between the United States and the British North American provinces can, least of all things, be admitted as an estimable element in a pecuniary computation. The importance of such maintenance of good understanding and good neighborhood the United States will never undervalue. In this interest large fiscal concessions were made by the United States in the adjustments of the treaty of Washington. After such concessions, the superadded submission to the Halifax Commission of the question of equalizing, by a pecuniary measure, those concessions with supposed equivalent concessions by Her Majesty's Government, was entertained and agreed to by the United States, mainly, if not entirely, in the disposition to meet any just interest of the British North American provinces to be assured of the equality of these intended equivalents.

But the maintenance of these good relations is of common interest to the two countries, and can never be made the occasion of pecuniary tribute as if of more importance to one than to the other. No such calculation entered into the enlightened and conciliatory motives which animated and shaped the important series of negotiations which produced the treaty of Washington. In the definition of whatever unadjusted computation was referred, for pecuniary settlement, to the Halifax Commission, care was taken to include nothing which, suitably to the honor of both countries, was not measurable by a scale of industrial and commercial profits. If these plain considerations shall be viewed in this light by Her Majesty's Government, it is hoped that a concurrence of opinion as to the nature of the question actually submitted to a pecuniary measure, by the Halifax Commission, may be easily reached.

It can not be very material to recall Lord Salisbury's attention to the historical attitude of the two governments toward the subject in contention as to the fisheries by any present exposition of the matter. The sources of knowledge on this subject are common to the public cognizance of the two governments. Our diplomatic intercourse has unfolded the views of successive British and American cabinets upon the conflicting claims of mere rights, on the one side and the other, and at the same time evinced, on both sides, an amicable preference for practical and peaceful enjoyment of the fisheries, compatibly with a common interest, rather than a sacrifice of such common interest to a purpose of insisting upon extreme right at a loss, on both sides, of what was to each the advantage sought by the contention. In this disposition the two countries have inclined, more and more, to retire from irreconcilable disputations as to the true intent covered by the somewhat careless and, certainly, incomplete text of the convention of 1818, and to look at the true elements of profits and prosperity in the fisheries themselves, which alone, to the one side or the other, made the shares of their respective participation therein worthy of dispute.

This sensible and friendly view of the matter in dispute was greatly assisted by the experience of the Provincial populations of a period of common enjoyment of the fisheries without attention to any sea-line of demarkation, but with a certain distribution of industrial and economical advantages in the prosecution and the product of this common enjoyment. The form of this experience was twofold: First, for the period of twelve years, under the reciprocity arrangement of trade between the United States and those Provinces; and, second, for a briefer period after the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty, under a system of licenses which obliterated the sea-line of circumscription to our fishing fleet, upon the payment of fees deemed adequate by the Provincial Governments.

In this disposition, and with this experience, the negotiations of the Treaty of Washington were taken up, and produced the fishery articles of that comprehensive treaty. The results of this experience, and the influence of this disposition, are plainly marked in the pertinent protocols and in the text of the articles.

At the outset it was apparent that neither a confirmation nor a rectification of the old sea-line of exclusion, or the adoption of a new one, had any place in the counsels or purposes of Her Majesty's Government, or in the interests or objects of Her Majesty's Provincial subjects. It had become thoroughly understood that the line of the convention of 1818 had become inapplicable, and, in some respects, insufferable, to the common interests.

The mackerel, always an inshore as well as a deep-sea fish off our coasts, at the date of the convention of 1818, and for twenty years after, as an object of pursuit to our fishermen, was confined to the coast of the United States, and that fishery was substantially unknown in any commercial sense in the Provincial waters. Either a change of habits in the fish or an extension of the enterprise of our fishermen had opened up the mackerel fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to our pursuit. The gradual increase of the fishing-coast population of the Provinces had supplied the fishermen and excited the local interest for the prosecution from the shore, as the base of its operations, of the new industry of inshore mackerel fishing.

Upon the concurrence of these circumstantial changes it was natural enough for the coast population and the public men of the provinces to conclude that the territorial authority, which, under the convention of 1818, gave to the provinces the monopoly of the inshore mackerel fishery, only needed to be insisted upon, by a vigorous exclusion of our fishermen, to be fruitful of great local prosperity.

These calculations were disappointed. It was soon found that the provinces themselves were comparatively valueless as a market for mackerel, and that the quality of the fish, as respects the methods of its preparation for export, excluded it from the general foreign market which was open to the product of the cod fisheries. The near market of the United States was essential to the local prosperity of the inshore mackerel fishermen of the provinces. The political control of that market by the United States quite overreached the provincial control of the inshore fishing-grounds. Fish that can not find a market will not long be pursued for gain, and the fishing-coast population and the statesmen of the provinces alike saw that a participation in the mackerel market of the United States was the indispensable condition of prosperity to their inshore fishery. Experience confirmed the logic of this reasoning. While the reciprocity treaty endured, settlements thrived and wealth increased. When it was withdrawn, population shrank and wealth declined, and, but for the hope of its renewal, a destruction of this industry seemed imminent.

Upon the other hand, the mackerel fishermen of the United States felt that a participation in the inshore fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence was no equivalent for a surrender of our mackerel market to the participation of the inshore fishermen of the provinces. They justly reasoned that this arrangement, in respect of the mackerel catch within the line, instead of placing the provincial fishing industry upon an equal footing with ours, really put us at quite a disadvantage. Ordinarily, home products have a certain measure of advantage over duty-free competing imports, in freight, ocean or inland, insurance and interest and factorage. But here, what passes for our home product is acquired upon the very shore of our foreign competitor. Its pursuit is at the expense of an extended voyage, with costly outfit and large investment, at great risk, with long delay, measured by heavy insurance and accruing interest. Bringing it to what is called the home market involves the return voyage and the attendant burdens of expense.

The farmer-fishermen of the provincial coasts leave the plow in the furrow and the hay-cart in the field, and take to the simple implements and open boats with which fishing from the shore is prosecuted when the mackerel show themselves. They cure their catch as a part of their home labor, and ship it, at low rates, to our market by bottoms which make a returning commercial freight. At these odds, the share of the inshore mackerel fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence seemed to our fishermen but a poor addition to their former extensive rights to be purchased by so great a disadvantage in their general fishing industry on our own coasts, and in the deep-sea as well as the inshore fisheries of the provincial waters.

These views, too, were confirmed by our experience during the reciprocity arrangement and after its close. Both periods, unmistakably, marked the policy of an open market for the products of the provincial fisheries as disastrous to our fishing industry.

With these opinions and these experiences, on the one side and on the other, the High Commissioners undertook an adjustment of the opposing interests upon the principle of obliterating the sea-line between the fishermen of the two countries, and find such compensation for this concession as might seem equal and just.

In the conferences of the Joint High Commission, it is very apparent that our High Commissioners regarded the obliteration of the sea-line as of no great pecuniary value to our fishing industry. Accordingly, they offered but a million of dollars for this concession, in perpetuity. No doubt, politically and in the interest of good neighborhood, this Government did regard, and at all times would regard, the restoration of the relations between the two countries, in the common enjoyment of these fisheries, to the ancient footing of the treaty of 1783, as most grateful in sentiment and as a most valuable guaranty against any renewal of strife. These considerations, for reasons already stated, could not be worthily entertained upon either side as an element of the pecuniary measure of the privileges to be accorded.

In these conferences it is not less apparent that Her Majesty's High Commissioners recognized the possession of our market for the product of the provincial fisheries as the one thing essential to the prosperity of those fisheries, which could not be dispensed with or replaced by any money purchase. This commercial advantage was, of course, both practically and suitably to the dignity of the negotiation, measurable in money. It seemed to our High Commissioners to exceed in value to the provinces, as it unquestionably did in loss to us, any reasonable estimate of the value of the privilege our fishermen were to acquire. This basis, however, of freedom of the fishing grounds to our fishermen, and the freedom of our market to the fishermen of the provinces, in simplicity and rational equivalency, presented advantages which might well have dispensed with any nice calculation of comparative pecuniary values in the exchange.

Her Majesty's High Commissioners, however, thought that this exchange of privileges, even with the added concession on our part of throwing open to the provincial fishermen unrestricted participation in the valuable inshore fisheries of our own coasts above the thirty-ninth parallel, left still a claim for a pecuniary make-weight in favor of the provinces in the nature of owelty of partition. This led to the constitution of the Halifax Commission, to consider and decide the single question whether, and how much, the pecuniary measure of the new fishing privilege opened to the United States fishermen exceeded the pecuniary measure of the new fishing privilege opened to the provincial fishermen and of the possession of our market, free of duty, for all the products of the provincial fisheries. This difference between the two pecuniary valuations was, in the nature of the problem, no less than by the terms of the treaty, to be expressed and paid in money.

Upon the conclusion of the labors of the Halifax Commission and the communication of the concurring judgment of the two commissioners, awarding the sum of $5,500,000 as the amount to be paid by the United States under the fishery articles of the treaty, and the judgment of the dissenting commissioner that no sum whatever was payable by the United States under those articles, it became the duty of this Government to compare this result with the authority imparted to the commission by the treaty, and to determine whether it comported with or transcended such authority.

It will not, I think, be questioned by Her Majesty's Government that, upon the proofs and arguments, in whatever form submitted by the two Governments to the commission, the practical measure of the concession to the United States, under Article XVIII of the treaty, was simply of a free and equal right to take part in the fisheries of the Gulf of St. Lawrence within the 3-miles line, instead of being excluded therefrom, as we were under the convention of 1818. Nor do I anticipate that you will find any dissent on the part of Lord Salisbury from the proposition that the proofs fully show that the fishery thus opened to us was the mackerel fishery within that line.

While both Governments must regret that the sure footing for a concurrence of views between them, which might have been furnished by a careful system of protocols of the conferences of the commission, is wanting, yet the proofs on both sides leave this proposition in no doubt. Indeed, since the publication by Parliament of the "Correspondence respecting the Halifax Fisheries Commission" has disclosed the advices given, from time to time, to Her Majesty's Government by Mr. Ford, the very intelligent and circumspect British agent in attendance upon the commission, of the developments of the real subject for valuation, there seems no room for any difference of views between the two Governments on this point. Thus, in his dispatch of September 10, 1877, presenting the position, upon the completion of the British evidence, and before the opening of the proofs on the part of the United States, Mr. Ford says: "The mackerel fishery, being that most extensively pursued by Americans in British waters, is the branch of inquiry to which the greatest attention was devoted."

In giving, too, in the same dispatch the general results of any pecuniary measure of benefit to the United States fishermen from the concession of Article XVIII of the treaty, which the completed British proofs had presented as a basis for an award, Mr. Ford makes it very apparent that the mackerel catch within the 3-mile line was the only item of appreciable importance.

He says: "According to the evidence adduced on the British side, it seems beyond doubt that at least three-quarters of the mackerel taken on the British North American coast is caught within the 3-mile limit; while, owing probably to the existence of sandy shoals at some distance from the shore, the catch of this fish in United States waters north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude is principally beyond that distance." Mr. Ford also, upon the mere British proofs, no less distinctly excludes the cod fishery as an element of the computation of the value to us of the concession of Article XVIII. He says: "The cod fishery is pursued to a limited extent only by United States fishermen within British territorial waters, and this is probably the case with hake, haddock, pollock, etc." And again, "The evidence is somewhat vague as to the proportion of codfish taken by Americans in British inshores, and it does not probably amount to anything considerable, except on certain portions of the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence."

Mr. Ford's dispatch, upon a survey of the counter-proofs of the United States, which had just been completed, under date of October 30, 1877, presents the contention between the parties and as recognized by both sides in the same light. He says:

"Seventy-eight witnesses, in all, have been examined and two hundred and eighty affidavits filed, on the United States side; and, as was the case on the British side, the main part of it has been directed to the mackerel fishery, with regard to which the United States counsel have sought to establish the following salient points:

"1. That the fishing grounds principally resorted to by the United States fishermen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence are on the Banks situated outside the 3-mile limit and at the Magdalene Islands, to which they had access previous to the conclusion of the treaty of Washington.

"2. That the fishing business is at the best an unprofitable one as regards its net results to the owners or charterers of vessels. A mass of statistics has been put in evidence with a view to prove this assertion and to show that the Canadian inshore fisheries can hardly be pursued by United States citizens except at a loss; while those on their own shore yield a greater prospect of remunerative results.

"3. That the remission of duties on Canadian fish is a great benefit to the producer, inasmuch as the chief market for mackerel is the United States."

In the same dispatch, Mr. Ford, in certain observations of his own upon the countervailing force of the proofs of the United States, as a whole, against the British proofs, as a whole, shows that the valuation of the inshore mackerel fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence opened to our fishermen was the whole matter of contention before the commission in respect of the concession of Article XVIII of the treaty. He remarks:

"I may, however, observe that as it has never been denied, even by the British side, that a certain portion of the mackerel taken by the United States vessels in the Gulf of St. Lawrence is caught outside the 3-mile limit, there could be no difficulty in producing a considerable number of fishermen who would truthfully depose that the majority of their successful trips had been made outside the limit of British territorial jurisdiction. The main fact, however, remains practically intact, namely, that without access to the inshores it would be impossible for the general business of mackerel fishing by the United States vessels in the Gulf of St. Lawrence to be pursued with profitable results."

It seems to this government quite certain, then, that upon a correct exposition of the submission of the treaty, and the concurring action of the two Governments, in the production and application of what they deemed appropriate proofs, what the pecuniary value of our participation in the inshore mackerel fishery of the Gulf of St. Lawrence was fairly estimable at, constituted the extreme limit of any possible pecuniary award by the Halifax Commission against the United States. If upon any rational view of the criteria of this value before the commission the award of the two concurring commissioners of $5,500,000 as a twelve years' purchase of the privilege can be maintained, it may be fairly conceded that the imputation of invalidity to the award for transcending the submission of the treaty will fail of adequate demonstration.

If, on the other hand, the candid exploration of the evidence shall show that there exists no rational proportion between this award and the unquestionable limits of value which any view of the testimony must assign to the subject submitted for valuation by the treaty as correctly interpreted, then, by the very statement of the proposition, it is demonstrated that the concurring commissioners have passed their judgment of valuation upon some other subject than that defined in Article XVIII of the treaty, and have transcended the submission to their decision. In such case the antecedent authority imparted to the commission by the two Governments fails to justify the award, and the subject of the fisheries remains at the arbitrament of the two Governments unconstrained, though perhaps enlightened, by the deliberations of the Halifax Commission.

In proceeding to apply the proposed test of conformity or non-conformity between the award and the submission, I disclaim all right to trench upon the range of discretion, or to dispute the entire freedom in comparing, weighing, and extracting the true results from evidence which belongs to such special tribunals as the Halifax Commission. I shall not seek, in the least, to impose any views of my Government upon the evidence in the place of any that may be assumed even, to have been taken by the concurring commissioners. I do, however, insist that upon any question of fact, within the submission, the record of the evidence can not be surpassed by spontaneous conjectures or imaginations of the commissioners. I have no difficulty in saying that the error of the concurring commissioners, if error they have fallen into, does not seem to me of this nature. That error is not of mistaking the evidence adduced upon the subject submitted to them, but of mistaking the subject submitted to them, and thus liberating their judgments from obedience to the evidence thus adduced.

Fortunately, there are trustworthy criteria for determining the value of the concession of Article XVIII, as I have defined that concession to be. They are resorted to, upon one side and the other, and confessedly furnish the material upon which the appraisement, if confined to the subject as truly defined, must turn. If, then, upon the evidence, if found conflicting or divergent, the largest measure of valuation deducible therefrom be given in favor of the concession of Article XVIII, and that extreme value shall show no rational or approximate relation to the sum awarded, there would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that the concurring commissioners accepted some other subject for their appraisement than that submitted to them.

It happened that before the Halifax Commission had concluded its labors five fishing seasons of the treaty period had already elapsed, and the actual experience of the enjoyment by the United States fishermen of the privilege conceded replaced any conjectural estimate of its value by reliable statistics of its pecuniary results. These statistics disclosed that the whole mackerel catch of the United States for these five seasons in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, both within and without the 3-mile line, was 167,945 barrels. The provincial estimates claimed that three-quarters of this catch was within the 3-mile line, and so to be credited to the privilege conceded by Article XVIII. The United States estimate placed the proportion at less than a quarter. Upon the provincial claim of three-quarters, the product to our fishermen of these five years of inshore fishing would be 125,961 barrels.

It was established, upon provincial testimony, that the price which mackerel bore in the provinces, cured and packed ready for exportation, was $3.75 per barrel, and this would give as the value, cured and packed, of the United States inshore catch for five years, the sum of $472,353. But in this value are included the barrel, the salt, the expense of catching, curing, and packing, which must all be deducted before the profit, which measures the value of the fishery privilege, is reached. Upon the evidence, a dollar a barrel would be an excessive estimate of net profit, and this would give a profit to our fishermen, from the enjoyment for these five seasons of the fishery privilege conceded under Article XVIII, of but $25,000 a year, or for the whole treaty period of twelve years of $300,000.

Although there would seem to be no reason for distrusting this commercial and pecuniary measure of the privilege in question, yet if it should be pretended that the provincial value should not be taken, but the value in the market of the United States; and, further, that an extravagant rate of $10 per barrel should be assumed as that value, and, again, beyond all bounds of even capricious estimate, a conjectural profit of 50 per cent. should be assigned to the fishing adventures, we should have but $125,000 a year, or $1,500,000 for the entire twelve years of the treaty, for the gross valuation of the concession to the United States by Article XVIII, undiminished, by a penny, for the counter-concessions of the United States of Articles XIX and XXI. Yet this sum, thus reached, is but little more than one-quarter of the award of the concurring commissioners, after taking into account the deductions required for the privileges of Articles XIX and XXI.

The proofs disclose another wholly independent criterion of the value of the privilege conceded to our fishermen by Article XVIII of the treaty, drawn from the experience of some years intervening between the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty and the negotiation of the treaty of Washington. The provincial government in these years adopted a license system by which vessels of the United States were admitted to the inshore fishery upon the payment of fees for the season, rated by the ton. The experience of this system showed that under an exaction of 50 cents per ton our fishing-fleet generally took out licenses; that when the fee was raised to $1 per ton, the number of licenses fell off about one-half; and when a fee of $2 per ton was exacted, but few licinses were taken out. The fairness of this measure of the value of the privilege is obvious. It furnishes a compensatory rate between opposing interests, suggested and acted upon by them without coercion, and by concurring consent.

The tonnage, taking out licenses under the first and lowest rate, was about 32,000 tons. Assuming, contrary to experience, that this tonnage would have borne the highest rate of $2 per ton, the sum of $64,000 per annum would have measured the value of the privilege in question, and would have yielded for the treaty period of twelve years $768,000. By this method the valuation of the privilege of Article XVIII (without deducting a penny for the counter-privileges of Articles XIX and XXI) would be but about 14 per cent. of the award of the concurring commissioners, after they had taken into account these privileges.

You will say, then, to Lord Salisbury, that with every anxiety to find some rational explanation of the enormous disparity between the pecuniary computations of the evidence and the pecuniary measure announced by the concurring commissioners, this Government has been unable to do so upon any other hypothesis than that the very matter defined in Article XVIII, and to which the proofs on both sides were applied, and the very matter measured by the award of the concurring commissioners, were not identical nor even similar, and that such award, upon this reason, transcends the submission.

The demonstration at which I have aimed appears so conclusive upon the mere consideration of the concession of Article XVIII, as to supersede, so far as the immediate argument goes, an exhibition of the reduction even of the moderate sum above assigned as the true appraisal of the concession of that article by the pecuniary value, as laid before the commission, of the counter-concessions of Articles XIX and XXI. But a brief statement of the views of this Government on the treatment of these counter-concessions in the deliberations of the Halifax Commission is requisite both to the completeness and the frankness of this exposition.

In brief, it may be said that Her Majesty's Government formally insisted in their "Case" and in their "Reply," laid before the commission, that the concession of Article XIX, whereby British subjects are admitted to the freedom of our coast fisheries north of the thirty-ninth parallel, is, to quote the language of the "Case," "absolutely valueless;" and that the concession of Article XXI, admitting fish and fish-oil, the product of the provincial fisheries, to our markets duty free, to quote the language of the "Reply," "has not resulted in pecuniary profit to the British fishermen, but, on the contrary, to the American dealer or consumer."

If I have been at all successful in showing the enormous disproportion between the sum of $5,500,000 announced as their award by the concurring commissioners, and the pecuniary value which the evidence assigns to the concessions of Article XVIII, by itself considered, I need spend little time in showing that these commissioners must have accepted the views of Her Majesty's Government that nothing was to be aliowed for countervailing value to the concessions of Articles XIX and XXI, or that these commissioners had in their minds a measure for the concession of Article XVIII still more inconsistent with the true treaty definition of the subject described in that article and submitted to the appraisement of the commission.

If the concession of Article XIX was held by these commissioners to be "absolutely valueless," as asserted in the "case" of Her Majesty's Government, it must have been because the pecuniary profit to the provincial fishermen of the privilege, as actually enjoyed by them, was the true measure of estimation of the value of the concession. In this view, the immense value of these fisheries, as shown in the evidence, all went for nothing, because the population, capital, or enterprise in the provinces could not carry on what to them were remote fisheries in competition with our own coast population. Without insisting upon the unreasonableness of measuring the value of our fishing grounds by the incapacity of Provincial resources to engage in the fishery opened to them, this disposition of the value of the concession of Article XIX recognizes the whole force and result of the reasoning by which I have assigned the true criteria of value for the privileges of Article XVIII, under the experience of the actual five years' enjoyment thereof by our fishermen, who were able to take advantage of the privilege, and did so to the furthest extent compatible with profit. The vice of the reasoning by which a right of fishing, valuable in its own capacity, is measured by the tenant's incapacity to fish, is obvious. It furnishes no true criterion of the rent value of a fishery, which is what was needed to be got at, both under Article XVIII and Article XIX. Under Article XVIII we furnished a true criterion by the experience of a tenant, confessedly willing and able to improve the fishery to the utmost, and actually doing so.

I now desire you to present to Lord Salisbury's attention the subject of the concession of a free market in the United States for the products of the provincial fisheries as made by Article XXI. The value of this privilege to the provinces was required by the treaty to be measured by the Halifax Commission and deducted from their appraisement of the concession of Article XVIII in favor of the United States.

The statistics of the importation under this privilege showed that at the rate of duty prevalent before that concession, a revenue of about $200,000 per annum on mackerel alone, and of more than $300,000 on all kinds of fish (mackerel included) and fish oil, would have accrued to the United States. For the purpose of argument, conceding that but one-half of this annual sum of $300,000 should be set down as pecuniary profit to the Provincial interests, the sum of $1,800,000 would need to be deducted on the score of Article XXI from the true valuation of the privilege conceded by Article XVIII. If I have assigned correctly the highest possible measure of the privilege of Article XVIII, upon the evidence, as being not more than $1,500,000, this low valuation of the privilege of Article XXI more than extinguishes it.

Whatever disposition the concurring commissioners made of this countervailing concession of Article XXI—whether they gave it a value commensurate with the statistical evidence of the revenue loss to the United States and market gain to the Provincial interest, or considered it absolutely valueless—the matter is one of much moment.

If these concurring commissioners gave the sum of $5,500,000 as the appraisement of the concession of Article XVIII, after deducting some $2,000,000 for the countervailing concession of Article XXI, the argument, as it seems to this Government, adequate before, becomes still more conclusive that the measurement, thus enhanced to some $7,500,000, was not applied and confined to the very subject submitted to the appraisement of the commission by Article XVIII.

But, it may be said, these concurring commissioners may have treated the concession of Article XXI as absolutely valueless to the provincial interests, and it was competent to them to do so. But this alternative is little consistent with the whole tenor of the views of Her Majesty's Government as maintained by successive cabinets and insisted upon in responsible negotiations, by their most eminent representatives, through a long course of years. Certainly, ever since 1851, when Lord Elgin, as governor-general of Canada, communicated through the British minister at Washington, Sir Henry Bulwer, to Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, the opinion of the British Government that the admission of the product of the provincial fisheries duty free to our market was the one indispensable condition to our participation in the inshore fisheries of the provinces, down to the negotiations of the treaty of Washington, the attitude of the British Government on this point has been explicit and unequivocal.

Lord Elgin declared:

"Her Majesty's Government are prepared, on certain conditions and with certain reservations, to make the concession to which so much importance seems to have been attached by Mr. Clayton, namely, to throw open to the fishermen of the United States the fisheries in the waters of the British North American colonies, with permission to those fishermen to land on the coast of those colonies for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the owners of private property or with the operations of British fishermen.

"Her Majesty's Government would require, as the indispensable condition in return for this concession, that all fish, either fresh or cured, imported into the United States from the British North American possessions, in vessels of any nation or description, should be admitted into the United States duty free, and upon terms in all respects of equality with fish imported by citizens of the United States."

The deliberations of the Joint High Commission, as presented in the protocols of their conferences on the fisheries, exhibit with perfect distinctness the British opinion as to a free market for the product of theP rovincial fisheries being a value to provincial interests which could not be missed or replaced by a pecuniary substitute in any settlement of the question. Thus, our high commissioners stated "that if the value of the inshore fisheries could be ascertained the United States might prefer to purchase for a sum of money the right to enjoy in perpetuity the use of those inshore fisheries in common with British fishermen, and mentioned $1,000,000 as the sum they were prepared to offer." The British high commissioners replied "that this offer was, they thought, wholly inadequate, and that no arrangement would be acceptable of which the admission into the United States, free of duty, of fish the produce of the British fisheries, did not form a part."

After a consideration of commercial equivalents, in which the offers of our high commissioners were not accepted by the British high commissioners, all such propositions on our part were withdrawn, and our commissioners renewed their proposal to pay a money equivalent for the use of the inshore fisheries, and further proposed that, in case the two Governments should not be able to agree upon the sum to be paid as an equivalent, the matter should be referred to an impartial commission for determination. To this the British high commissioners replied "that it would not be possible for them to come to any arrangement except one for a term of years, and involving the concession of free fish and fish oil by our commissioners; but that if free fish and fish oil were conceded, they would inquire of their Government whether they were prepared to assent to a reference to arbitration as to money payment." Our high commissioners replied "that they were of opinion that free fish and fish oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries, but that they were also willing to agree to a reference to determine that question and the amount of any money payment that might be found necessary to complete an equivalent." Hereupon, as stated in the protocol, "the British commissioners having referred the last proposal to their Government and received instructions to accept it," the fishery articles of the treaty were agreed to.

These opinions of Her Majesty's Government were entirely in accord with the views of the leading Provincial statesmen. Mr. Stewart Campbell, of Nova Scotia, declared that, "under the reciprocity treaty, the total exemption from duty of all fish exported from the maritime provinces to the markets of the United States was also a boon of inestimable value to the very large class of British subjects directly and indirectly connected with our fisheries and its resulting trade." Sir John Macdonald said, in the Parliament of the Dominion, "the only market for the Canadian No. 1 mackerel in the world is the United States. That is our only market, and we are practically excluded from it by the present duty. The consequence of that duty is that our fishermen are at the mercy of the American fishermen. They are made the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the Americans. They are obliged to sell their fish at the American's own price. The American fishermen purchase their fish at a nominal value and control the American market. The great profits of the trade are handed over to the American fishermen or the American merchants engaged in the trade, and they profit to the loss of our own industry and our own people."

It may be that Her Majesty's Government has surrendered these opinions, and that the statesmen of the Dominion and the people of the provinces now think that the possession of our market for the products of the provincial fisheries is of no pecuniary advantage to these Provincial interests. In such case, in any future negotiations respecting the fisheries, this Government would expect no stress to be laid upon this question of the possession of our own markets.

If Her Majesty's Government accepts the award of these concurring commissioners as carrying the necessary consequence that the concession of Article XXI is of no value to British or provincial interests, that element of calculation will disappear from any possible exchange of equivalents that the exigencies of any future friendly negotiations may need to find at their service. A privilege that is valueless when granted to and enjoyed by a beneficiary may well be reserved and withheld without the charge of its being even ungracious to do so.

If, on the other hand, Her Majesty's Government adheres to the views of the value of our market for the product of the provincial fisheries, so often and so earnestly pressed upon the attention of this Government, and asserts that tho award of the concurring commissioners must be held, upon necessary reasoning, to have measured and deducted this great value of free market from the appraisement of the concession of free fishing to us, made by them under Article XVIII, this Government will expect the more ready acceptance by Her Majesty's Government of the proposition, that these concurring commissioners, in their award, mistook the subject submitted by Article XVIII to their pecuniary measurement, and exceeded the authority under which the commission acted.

You will, however, very earnestly press upon Lord Salisbury's attention, in advance of any declaration from Her Majesty's Government of their present views of the value of our markets for the products of the provincial fisheries, that this Government has not changed or at all modified its opinions on this subject. To dissemble or conceal from Her Majesty's Government this fact would be uncandid, and, by silence on our part now, breed mischief for future contentions or negotiations. This Government holds now, as it did by the mouth of its high commissioners in the conferences on the subject of the fisheries which produced the pertinent articles of the treaty, "that free fish and fish-oil would be more than an equivalent for those fisheries." The measure of pecuniary value which I have drawn from the revenue loss to the United States, calculated with extreme moderation, is an inadequate expression of the benefit to provincial interests and injury to our own from free importations.

It is still the opinion of this Government that the possession of our market is of vital importance to the maritime provinces, and such possession a formidable menace, if not a fatal wound, to our own fishing interests. I do not think that I misunderstand or misrepresent those interests when I say that standing, as we now do, midway in the treaty period, it would be better for those interests to surrender the enjoyment of the fishing privilege of Article XVIII for the remaining six years of the twelve, upon a resumption by this Government of the control of our own market for this unexpired period. If Her Majesty's Government and the provincial statesmen are firm in the opinion that the concession of Article XVIII parts with so much to us, and the concession of Article XXI is valueless to British and provincial interests, it may well be worth while for the two Governments to consider whether a mutual resumption of these exchanged interests may not be desirable.

Mr. Evarts to Mr. Welsh.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 28, 1878.

SIR: I received in due course your dispatch of August 24 ultimo, inclosing Lord Salisbury's reply of the British Government to the representations that had been made to it as early as March last by you, under instructions from the Department.

But a careful attention to Lord Salisbury's note discovers what must be regarded as an expression of his views, at least, of the authority of provincial legislation and administrative jurisdiction over our fishermen within the 3-mile line, and of the restrictive limitations upon their rights on these fishing-grounds under the treaty of Washington. Upon any aspect of the evidence, on one side and the other, as qualifying the violent acts from which our fishing fleet has suffered at the hands of the Newfoundland coast fishermen, the views thus intimated seem to this Government wholly inadmissible, and do not permit the least delay on our part in frankly stating the grounds of our exception to them.

The report of Captain Sulivan presents, as a justificatory support of the action of the Newfoundland shore fishermen, in breaking up the operations of our fishing-fleet inside the 3-mile line, at the time covered by these transactions, the violation of certain municipal legislation of the Newfoundland government which, it is alleged, our fishermen were in the act of committing when the violent interruption of their industry occurred. I do not stop to point out the serious distinction between the official and judicial execution of any such laws and the orderly enforcement of their penalties after solemn trial of the right, and the rage and predominant force of a volunteer multitude driving off our peaceful occupants of these fishing grounds pursuing their industry under a claim of right secured to them by treaty. I reserve this matter for a complete examination when the conflicting proofs are in my possession.

I shall assume, for my present purpose, that the manner of exerting this supposed provincial authority was official, judicial, and unexceptionable.

I will state these justifications for the disturbance of our fishing fleet in Captain Sulivan's own language, that I may not even inadvertently impute to Lord Salisbury's apparent adoption of them any greater significance than their very language fairly imports.

Captain Sulivan assigns the following violations of law by our fishermen as the grounds of rightful interference with them on the occasion in question:

"First. That the Americans were using seines for catching herring on the 6th of January, 1878, in direct violation of Title XXVII, chapter 192, section 1, of the consolidated statutes of Newfoundland, namely: 'No person shall haul or take herring by or in a seine or other such contrivance on or near any part of the coast of this colony or of its dependencies, or in any of the bays, harbors, or other places therein, at any time between the 20th day of October and the 25th day of April.'"

"Second. That the American captains were setting and putting out seines and hauling and taking herring on Sunday, the 6th January, in direct violation of section 4, chapter 7, of the act passed 26th April, 1876, entitled 'An act to amend the law relating to the coast fisheries, namely: 'No person shall, between the hours of 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 12 o'clock on Sunday night, haul or take any herring, caplin, or squid, with nets, seines, bunts, or any such contrivance for the purpose of such hauling or taking.'

"Third. That they were barring fish in direct violation of the continuance of the same act, Title XXVII, chapter 102, section 1, of the consolidated statutes of Newfoundland, 'or at any time use a seine or other contrivance for the catching or taking of herrings, except by way of shooting and forthwith hauling the same.'

"Fourth. That contrary to the terms of the treaty of Washington, in which it is expressly provided that they do not interfere with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose (see Article XVIII of the above-named treaty), they were fishing illegally, interfering with the rights of British fishermen and their peaceable use of that part of the coast then occupied by them, and of which they were actually in possession, their seines and boats, their huts, gardens, and land granted by government being situated thereon."

The facts which enter into the offenses imputed under the first, second, and third heads of Captain Sulivan's statement, and such offenses thus made out, would seem to be the only warrant for his conclusion under his fourth head, that the United States fishermen have exceeded their treaty right, and in their actual prosecution of their fishing were, when interrupted by the force complained of, interfering with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of that part of the coast then being in their occupancy for the same purpose, contrary to the proviso of Article XVIII of the treaty of Washington.

It is no part of my present purpose to point out that this alleged infraction of the reserved rights of the local fishermen does not justify the methods of correction or redress used to drive off our fishermen and break up their prosecution of the fishing. This may be reserved also for discussion when both governments have a fuller knowledge of the actual circumstances of the transaction.

In transmitting to you a copy of Captain Sulivan's report, Lord Salisbury says: "You will perceive that the report in question appears to demonstrate conclusively that the United States fishermen on this occasion had committed three distinct breaches of the law."

In this observation of Lord Salisbury this Government can not fail to see a necessary implication that Her Majesty's Government conceives that in the prosecution of the right of fishing accorded to the United States by Article XVIII of the treaty, our fishermen are subject to the local regulations which govern the coast population of Newfoundland in their prosecution of their fishing industry, whatever those regulations may be, and whether enacted before or since the treaty of Washington.

The three particulars in which our fishermen are supposed to be constrained by actual legislation of the province cover in principle every degree of regulation of our fishing industry within the 3-mile line which can well be conceived. But they are, in themselves, so important and so serious a limitation of the rights secured by the treaty as practically to exclude our fishermen from any profitable pursuit of the right, which, I need not add, is equivalent to annulling or canceling by the Provincial Government of the privilege accorded by the treaty with the British Government.

If our fishing fleet is subject to the Sunday laws of Newfoundland, made for the coast population; if it is excluded from the fishing-grounds for half the year, from October to April; if our "seines and other contrivances" for catching fish are subject to the regulations of the legislature of Newfoundland, it is not easy to see what firm or valuable measure for the privilege of Article XVIII, as conceded to the United States, this Government can promise to its citizens under the guaranty of the treaty.

It would not, under any circumstances, be admissible for one government to subject the persons, the property, and the interests of its fishermen to the unregulated regulation of another government upon the suggestion that such authority will not be oppressively or capriciously exercised, nor would any government accept as an adequate guaranty of the proper exercise of such authority over its citizens by a foreign government, that, presumptively, regulations would be uniform in their operation upon the subjects of both governments in similar case. If there are to be regulations of a common enjoyment, they must be authenticated by a common or joint authority.

But most manifestly the subject of the regulation of the enjoyment of the shore fishery by the resident provincial population, and of the inshore fishery by our fleet of fishing cruisers, does not tolerate the control of so divergent and competing interests by the domestic legislation of the provinces. Protecting and nursing the domestic interest at the expense of the foreign interest, on the ordinary motives of human conduct, necessarily shape and animate the local legislation. The evidence before the Halifax Commission makes it obvious that to exclude our fishermen from catching bait, and thus compel them to go without bait, or buy bait at the will and price of the provincial fishermen, is the interest of the local fishermen, and will be the guide and motive of such domestic legislation as is now brought to the notice of this Government.

You will therefore say to Lord Salisbury that this Government can not but express its entire dissent from the view of the subject that his lordship's note seems to indicate. This Government conceives that the fishery rights of the United States conceded by the treaty of Washington, are to be exercised wholly free from the restraints and regulations of the statutes of Newfoundland, now set up as authority over our fishermen, and from any other regulations of fishing now in force or that may hereafter be enacted by that government.

It may be said that a just participation in this common fishery by the two parties entitled thereto may, in the common interest of preserving the fishery and preventing conflicts between the fishermen, require regulation by some competent authority. This may be conceded. But should such occasion present itself to the common appreciation of the two governments, it need not be said that such competent authority can only be found in a joint convention that shall receive the approval of Her Majesty's Government and our own. Until this arrangement shall be consummated, this Government must regard the pretension that the legislation of Newfoundland can regulate our fishermen's enjoyment of the treaty right as striking at the treaty itself.

It asserts an authority on one side, and a submission on the other, which has not been proposed to us by Her Majesty's Government, and has not been accepted by this Government. I can not doubt that Lord Salisbury will agree that the insertion of any such element in the treaty of Washington would never have been accepted by this Government, if it could reasonably be thought possible that it could have been proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The insertion of any such proposition by construction now is equally at variance with the views of this Government.

The representations made to this Government by the interests of our citizens affected leave no room to doubt that this assertion of authority is as serious and extensive in practical relations as it is in principle. The rude application made to the twenty vessels in Fortune Bay of this asserted authority, in January last, drove them from the profitable prosecution of their projected cruises. By the same reason, the entire inshore fishery is held by us upon the same tenure of dependence upon the Parliament of the Dominion or the legislatures of the several provinces.

In the opinion of this Government, it is essential that we should at once invite the attention of Lord Salisbury to the question of provincial control over the fishermen of the United States in their prosecution of the privilege secured to them by the treaty. So grave a question, in its bearing upon the obligations of this Government under the treaty, makes it necessary that the President should ask from Her Majesty's Government a frank avowal or disavowal of the paramount authority of provincial legislation to regulate the enjoyment by our people of the inshore fishery, which seems to be intimated, if not asserted, in Lord Salisbury's note.

Before the receipt of a reply from Her Majesty's Government, it would be premature to consider what should be the course of this Government should this limitation upon the treaty privileges of the United States be insisted upon by the British Government as their construction of the treaty.

The Marquis of Salisbury to Mr. Welsh.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 7, 1878.

Apart, however, from the facts, in respect to which there appears to be a material divergence between the evidence collected by the United States Government and that collected by the colonial authorities, Mr. Evarts takes exception to my letter of the 23d, on the ground of my statement that the United States fishermen concerned have been guilty of breaches of the law. From this he infers an opinion on my part that it is competent for a British authority to pass laws, in supersession of the treaty, binding American fishermen within the 3-mile limit. In pointing out that the American fishermen had broken the law within the territorial limits of Her Majesty's dominions, I had no intention of inferentially laying down any principles of international law; and no advantage would, I think, be gained by doing so to a greater extent than the facts in question absolutely require.

I hardly believe, however, that Mr. Evarts would in discussion adhere to the broad doctrine which some portion of his language would appear to convey, that no British authority has a right to pass any kind of laws binding Americans who are fishing in British waters; for if that contention be just, the same disability applies à fortiori to any other power, and the waters must be delivered over to anarchy. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government will readily admit—what is, indeed, self-evident—that British sovereignty, as regards those waters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the treaty of Washington, which can not be modified or affected by any municipal legislation. I can not anticipate that with regard to these principles any difference will be found to exist between the views of the two governments.

If, however, it be admitted that the Newfoundland legislature have the right of binding Americans who fish within their waters by any laws which do not contravene existing treaties, it must further be conceded that the duty of determining the existence of any such contravention must be undertaken by the governments, and can not be remitted to the discretion of each individual fisherman. For such a discretion, if exercised on one side, can hardly be refused on the other. If any American fisherman may violently break a law which he believes to be contrary to treaty, a Newfoundland fisherman may violently maintain it if he believes it to be in accordance with treaty. As the points in issue are frequently subtle, and require considerable legal knowledge, nothing but confusion and disorder could result from such a mode of deciding the interpretation of the treaty.

Her Majesty's Government prefer the view that the law enacted by the legislature of the country, whatever it may be—ought to be obeyed by natives and foreigners alike who are sojourning within the territorial limits of its jurisdiction; but that if a law has been inadvertently passed which is in any degree or respect at variance with rights conferred on a foreign power by treaty, the correction of the mistake so committed, at the earliest period after its existence shall have been ascertained and recognized, is a matter of international obligation.

It is not explicitly stated in Mr. Evarts's dispatch that he considers any recent acts of the colonial legislature to be inconsistent with the rights acquired by the United States under the treaty of Washington. But if that is the case, Her Majesty's Government will in a friendly spirit consider any representations he may think it right to make upon the subject, with the hope of coming to a satisfactory understanding.

Mr. Welsh to Lord Salisbury.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, London, November 21, 1878.

MY LORD: I have been instructed by the President of the United States to tender to Her Majesty's Government the sum of $5,500,000 in gold coin, this being the sum named by the two concurring members of the Fisheries Commission (lately sitting at Halifax, under authority imparted thereto by the treaty of Washington) to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Government of Her Britannic Majesty.

I am also instructed by the President to say that such payment is made upon the ground that the Government of the United States desires to place the maintenance of good faith in treaties and the security and value of arbitration between nations above all questions in its relations with Her Britannic Majesty's Government as with all other governments.

Under this motive the Government of the United States decides to separate the questions of withholding payment from the considerations touching the obligation of this payment which have been presented to Her Majesty's Government in correspondence and which it reserves and insists upon.

I am, besides, instructed by the President to say that the Government of the United States deems it of the greatest importance to the common and friendly interests of the two Governments in all future treatment of any questions relating to the North American fisheries that Her Britannic Majesty's Government should be distinctly advised that the Government of the United States can not accept the result of the Halifax Commission as furnishing any just measure of the value of a participation by our citizens in the inshore fisheries of the British Provinces, and it protests against the actual payment now made being considered by Her Majesty's Government as in any sense an acquiescence in such measure or as warranting any inference to that effect.

I have, etc.,

JOHN WELSH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 17, 1880.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom were referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th of April, ultimo, requesting the President, "if not inconsistent with the public interest, to transmit to this House copies of all correspondence, not now communicated, with the English Government relating to the alleged interference with American fishermen in Fortune Bay, on the 6th of January, 1878," and a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of the same month on the same subject, has the honor to lay before the President the correspondence as called for.

In connection with these papers, and for the better understanding of the subject to which this correspondence relates, I submit for your consideration the valuable report of Collector F. J. Babson and Alfred D. Foster, esq., of their visit on board the naval steam-ship Kearsarge, to the provincial inshore fisheries under the instructions of the Department during the summer of last year, as well as their instructions under which this cruise of the Kearsarge was planned. This correspondence with the British Government, and this intelligent exposition of the attempted exercise by our fishermen of the freedom of the inshore fisheries as secured to them by the treaty of Washington, whose violent interruption gave occasion to this discussion between the two governments of the true measure of this treaty right, will, it is believed, with the record of the proceedings of the Halifax Commission, and the correspondence and protest which preceded and attended our payment of the award, furnish complete materials upon which the judgment of Congress can be formed and its action determined in the juncture of this fishery contention now demanding its serious consideration.

The very grave occurrence at Fortune Bay in January, 1878, was brought by me to the attention of the British Government in March of that year, with the view of obtaining redress for our fishermen for the gross violence and serious loss they suffered in their expulsion from this inshore fishery which they were prosecuting under the treaty of Washington. The reply of the British Government did not reach me until September 4 of that year. It disclosed possible grounds for the rejection of our claims which put upon our rights in the inshore fisheries such limitations of subserviency to British provincial or imperial legislation as seemed to me wholly inadmissible. These grounds were that our fishermen were pursuing their industry on Sunday, contrary to a law of Newfoundland, passed subsequent to the treaty of Washington; that they were using seines to take herring, contrary to a law of Newfoundland proscribing that method of fishing for the six months of the year between October and April; that they were using such seines in a manner prohibited at any season of the year by a statute which precluded catching herrings by means of seines "except by way of shooting and forthwith hauling the same."

In communicating the report of the evidence which was intended to show the time and manner at and in which our fishermen were pursuing their right, as a justification for their interruption in it, Lord Salisbury observed: "You will perceive that the report in question appears to demonstrate conclusively that the United States fishermen on this occasion had committed three distinct breaches of the law." To this intimation, even, that the freedom of the fishery accorded by an imperial treaty either had been subtracted by past or could be curtailed by future provincial legislation, I lost no time in opposing an explicit and unconditional rejection of such an interpretation of the treaty. In a dispatch to Mr. Welsh, on the 28th of September, I communicated to the British Government the views of this Government, as follows:

"In this observation of Lord Salisbury this Government can not fail to see a necessary implication that Her Majesty's Government conceives that in the prosecution of the right of fishing accorded to the United States by Article XVIII of the treaty, our fishermen are subject to the local regulations which govern the coast population of Newfoundland in their prosecution of their fishing industry, whatever those regulations may be, and whether enacted before or since the treaty of Washington.

"The three particulars in which our fishermen are supposed to be constrained by actual legislation of the province cover in principle every degree of regulation of our fishing industry within the 3-mile line which can well be conceived But they are in themselves so important and so serious a limitation of the rights secured by the treaty as practically to exclude our fishermen from any profitable pursuit of the right, which, I need not add, is equivalent to annulling or canceling, by the provincial government, the privilege accorded by the treaty with the British Government.

"If our fishing fleet is subject to the Sunday laws of Newfoundland, made for the coast population; if it is excluded from the fishing-grounds for half the year, from October to April; if our "seines and other contrivances" for catching fish are subject to the regulations of the legislature of Newfoundland, it is not easy to see what firm or valuable measure for the privilege of Article XVIII as conceded to the United States this Government can promise to its citizens under the guaranty of the treaty. It would not under any circumstances be admissible for one government to subject the persons, the property, and the interests of its fishermen to the unregulated regulation of another government upon the suggestion that such authority will not be oppressively or capriciously exercised, nor would any government accept, as an adequate guaranty of the proper exercise of such authority over its citizens by a foreign government that, presumptively, regulations would be uniform in their operation upon the subjects of both governments in similar case. If there are to be regulations of a common enjoyment, they must be authenticated by a common or joint authority.

"But most manifestly the subject of the regulation of the enjoyment of the shore fishery by the resident provincial population, and of the inshore fishery by our fleet of fishing cruisers, does not tolerate the control of so divergent and competing interests by the domestic legislation of the provinces. Protecting and nursing the domestic interest at the expense of the foreign interest, on the ordinary motives of human conduct, necessarily shape and animate the local legislation. The evidence before the Halifax Commission makes it obvious that to exclude our fishermen from catching bait, and thus compel them to go without bait, or buy bait at the will and price of the provincial fishermen, is the interest of the local fishermen, and will be the guide and motive of such domestic legislation as is now brought to the notice of this Government.

"You will therefore say to Lord Salisbury that this Government can not but express its entire dissent from the view of the subject that his lordship's note seems to indicate. This Government conceives that the fishery rights of the United States, conceded by the treaty of Washington, are to be exercised wholly free from the restraints and regulations of the statutes of Newfoundland, now set up as authority over our fishermen, and from any other regulations of fishing now in force, or that may hereafter be enacted by that government.

"It may be said that a just participation in this common fishery by the two parties entitled thereto may, in the common interest of preserving the fishery and preventing conflicts between the fishermen, require regulation by some competent authority. This may be conceded; but should such occasion present itself to the common appreciation of the two governments, it need not be said that such competent authority can only be found in a joint convention that shall receive the approval of Her Majesty's Government and our own. Until this arrangement shall be consummated, this Government must regard the pretension that the legislation of Newfoundland can regulate our fishermen's enjoyment of the treaty right as striking at the treaty itself.

"It asserts an authority on one side and a submission on the other, which has not been proposed to us by Her Majesty's Government, and has not been accepted by this Government. I can not doubt that Lord Salisbury will agree that the insertion of any such element in the treaty of Washington would never have been accepted by this Government if it could reasonably be thought possible that it could have been proposed by Her Majesty's Government. The insertion of any such proposition by construction now is equally at variance with the views of this Government.

"The representation made to this Government by the interests of our citizens affected leave no room to doubt that this assertion of authority is as serious and extensive in practical relations as it is in principle. The rude application made to the twenty vessels in Fortune Bay, of this asserted authority, in January last, drove them from the profitable prosecution of their projected cruises. By the same reason the entire inshore fishery is held by us upon the same tenure of dependence upon the Parliament of the Dominion or the legislatures of the several provinces.

* * * * * * *

"In the opinion of this Government, it is essential that we should at once invite the attention of Lord Salisbury to the question of provincial control over the fishermen of the United States in their prosecution of the privilege secured to them by the treaty. So grave a question, in its bearing upon the obligations of this Government under the treaty, makes it necessary that the President should ask from Her Majesty's Government a frank avowal or disavowal of the paramount authority of provincial legislation to regulate the enjoyment by our people of the inshore fishery, which seems to be intimated, if not asserted, in Lord Salisbury's note.

"Before the receipt of a reply from Her Majesty's Government, it would be premature to consider what should be the course of this Government should this limitation upon the treaty privileges of the United States be insisted upon by the British Government as their construction of the treaty."

In answer to this unequivocal presentation, both of the freedom of the fishery as this Government interpreted the concession of the treaty, and of the absolute suppression of this treaty right, as a matter of practical value to our fishermen by this actual provincial legislation, Lord Salisbury replied with less distinctness, no doubt, but yet in a sense which I could not but regard as disclaiming any right to qualify the treaty by municipal legislation previous or subsequent to its date. After intimating a dissent from the doctrine, if I had intended to assert it, "that no British authority has any right to pass any kind of law binding Americans who are fishing in British waters," Lord Salisbury says:

"On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government will readily admit what is, indeed, self-evident, that British sovereignty, as regards these matters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the treaty of Washington, which can not be modified or affected by any municipal legislation. I can not anticipate that with regard to these principles, any difference will be found to exist between the views of the two governments. If, however, it be admitted that the Newfoundland legislators have the right of binding Americans who fish within their waters, by any laws which do not contravene existing treaties, it must further be considered that the duty of determining the existence of any such contravention must be undertaken by the governments, and can not be remitted to the discretion of each individual fisherman, for such a discretion, if exercised on one side, can hardly be refused on the other. * * *

"Her Majesty's Government prefer the view that the law enacted by the legislature of the country, whatever it may be, ought to be obeyed by natives and foreigners alike who are sojourning within the territorial limits of its jurisdiction, but that if a law has been inadvertently passed which is in any degree or respect at variance with rights conferred on a foreign power by treaty, the correction of the mistake as committed, at the earliest period after its existence shall have been ascertained and recognized, is a matter of international obligation."

This dispatch was received by me in November, and on the 23d of the same month the payment of the award of the Halifax Commission was made at the date provided in the treaty. The further consideration of the Fortune Bay claims seemed to require only the verification of the facts on the part of our claimants, so far as they were drawn in question by, or were at variance with, the report made to the British Government by its officers, and the communication to that government of the results as finally insisted upon by us as the basis and measure of our claims. The correspondence called for by Congress and now submitted, shows the entire rejection of the claims on the grounds set forth in Lord Salisbury's dispatch of the 3d of April last.

Before considering the main proposition of the British Government, by which a direct and flat denial of the freedom of the inshore fisheries as claimed by this Government is interposed, I need to bring to attention two subordinate pretensions of Lord Salisbury's dispatch intended to fortify his main proposition.

It appeared that in the management of one, at least, of the seines at Fortune Bay our fishermen had used the strand for a temporary service in the process of inclosing the school of herring within the seine. This incident in the operation, in the original correspondence as in the transaction itself a mere subordinate feature of the process of seining complained of, is now made prominent in the dispatch of Lord Salisbury.

There being no allegation that this use of the strand violates any provincial regulation of the fisheries, the point is made that the freedom of the fisheries accorded by the treaty itself, in terms, excludes our fishermen from this incidental use of the strand in the process of taking fish by seines. A true interpretation of the treaty concession gives no support to this pretension. The concession of fishing is "to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the provinces * * * without being restricted to any distance from the shore." Besides this concession of fishing, which manifestly covers the use of the strand in the process of taking fish, a further permission to land upon the coasts and shores is conceded to our fishermen for the independent purpose of using the land for "drying their nets and curing their fish."

The contention seems to be that because specific permission to use the land for purposes not included in the process of "taking fish" is given in terms, therefore the use of the strand in the process of "taking fish" is excluded, though in the nature of the process of taking fish the temporary use of the strand in managing the seines is a part of the inshore fishing. This faulty reasoning is not helped at all by the proviso of the treaty, that our fishermen, in using their right on shore, shall not "interfere with the rights of private property or with British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coasts in their occupancy for the same purpose." If this proviso does not include the use of the strand in taking fish, it does not qualify the fishing concession. If it does include that use of the strand, then it construes such use as within the fishing concession, and qualifies it by the observance of private property on shore and non-interference with British fishermen using the strand in their fishing.

Lord Salisbury's reference to the argument of Mr. Foster before the Halifax Commission on the independent subject of the commercial privileges for which the British case demanded compensation in the awards (and which were rejected by the commission as not within the purview of the treaty), for the doctrines of this Government in regard to the use of the strand as an incident of the inshore fishery concession needs no serious comment here. If the "case" of either Government could fairly be referred to as maintaining propositions to which it should be held in this contention, the special arguments pro and con of counsel can not be usefully resorted to for this purpose.

In this interlocutory argument on the commercial question, the British counsel, in answering Mr. Foster, maintained the opposite construction of the treaty. Neither view had any important relation to the subject then under discussion.

The second topic of Lord Salisbury's dispatch, from which aid is sought for his main proposition, is the presentation of Mr. Marcy's circular to the collectors of customs, while the reciprocity treaty was in force, for promulgation among our fishermen, the whole text of which Lord Salisbury incorporates in his note.

In the full copy of this circular, which is appended (No. 5) to the Babson and Foster report, the fishery regulations of the provinces to which it relates are recited, and a reference to these is sufficient to displace any inference that this Government has assented to any curtailment, past or previous, by provincial legislation, of the freedom of the inshore fishery, as conceded to our fishermen by the terms of the reciprocity treaty or the treaty of Washington.

One of these regulations relates to the demarkation of "gurry grounds," and the other to the reservation of spawning grounds, during the spawning season, from invasion. "Gurry," or the offal of fish, was supposed to infect the waters, and the regulation was not of the right of taking fish, but of poisoning them. The care of the spawning beds in spawning season, in like manner, was a regulation of the breeding of fish, not a regulation of modes of American fishing. Both these regulations met the approval of this Government and were required by Mr. Marcy to be respected by our fishermen, for this reason, and in the sense of being within the reasonable province of local civil jurisdiction, and not encroaching upon the province of freedom of the fishery as imparted by the reciprocity treaty.

But the right of this Government to inspect all such laws and pass upon them as falling one side or the other of the line thus firmly drawn is explicitly stated by Mr. Marcy. He says, "should they be so framed or executed as to make any discrimination in favor of British fishermen, or to impair the rights secured to American fishermen by that treaty, those injuriously affected by them will appeal to this Government for redress." Accordingly, the fishermen are directed to make complaint, upon the case arising, either in respect to any law or its execution, "in order that the matter may be arranged by the two Governments."

The position of this Government, as laid down in my dispatch of September 28, 1878, is, therefore, unembarrassed by any attitude in this contention, heretofore taken in any diplomatic discussion of parallel treaty engagements. Any particular interpretation of the treaty as to the right to use the strand in fishing with seines, ceases to be of significance, in the issue now joined with the British Government, because the provincial laws in question prohibit the use of the seines at all, and the main proposition of the British Government subjects our treaty rights to such legislation. So, too, the scope of this main proposition can be neither obscured nor confused by the irrelevant consideration of the local jurisdiction, within 3 miles of the shore, over persons or property, of the running of civil or criminal process, of health or police regulations, of territorial sovereignty in the abstract.

The issue between the two governments is as to what regulations of the freedom of the fishery, in the very matter of the time and manner of taking fish, remain a part of British sovereignty over the fishery, under the color of sovereignty over the place, when exclusive sovereignty over the fishery has been parted with by Great Britain, and a participation in such fishery has been acquired by the United States, in the terms and on the considerations of the treaty of Washington.

Upon this issue the position of this Government was notified to the British Government in September, 1878, as follows:

"This Government conceives that the fishery rights of the United States conceded by the treaty of Washington are to be exercised wholly free from the restraints and regulations of the statutes of Newfoundland, now set up as authority over our fishermen, and from any other regulations of fishing now in force or that may hereafter be enacted by that government."

Upon this issue the position of the British Government is now notified to us by the dispatch of Lord Salisbury, of April 3, ultimo, as follows. Referring to these statutes of Newfoundland, Lord Salisbury says:

"These regulations, which were in force at the date of the treaty of Washington, were not abolished, but confirmed by the subsequent statutes, and are binding under the treaty upon the citizens of the United States in common with British subjects. The United States fishermen, in landing for the purpose of fishing at Tickle Beach, in using a seine at a prohibited time, and in barring herrings with seines from the shore, exceeded their treaty privileges and were engaged in unlawful acts."

Lord Salisbury further states that Her Majesty's Government "have always admitted the incompetence of the colonial or the imperial legislature to limit, by subsequent legislation, the advantages secured by treaty to the subjects of another power."

There are but two grounds upon which the subordination of the United States' freedom of the inshore fisheries to imperial or provincial legislation, curtailing or burdening that freedom, ever has been, or, in the nature of the case, can be placed.

The first is that of reserved general sovereignty within the 3-mile limit, under cover of which it is pretended there lurked in the concession of the freedom of this fishery to the United States, in common with Great Britain, the power of one party in the privilege of this common fishery to regulate the enjoyment of it by the other. The statement of this proposition confutes it. The United States would have acquired nothing of right, if the concession was constantly subject to the will of Great Britain for its exercise and enjoyment. Accordingly, Lord Salisbury disclaims this pretension as ever having been held by the British Government as a reserved power capable of exercise by any regulations subsequent to the date of the treaty of Washington. But, manifestly, antecedent regulations, as having force subsequent to the treaty, can not be sustained upon the ground of sovereignty over the treaty concessions by any better reason than new legislation of that quality and effect.

If the treaty predominates over subsequent provincial legislation, encroaching upon the treaty concessions, by stronger reason it supplants previous provincial legislation subversive or restrictive of the treaty concession. If such previous legislation persists after the treaty comes into operation, it must be because the treaty in terms or by just interpretation accepts this previous legislation as a part of itself. But this is the predominance of the treaty and not of the legislation, which thenceforth owes its vigor to the stipulations of the treaty by which the United States adopts and confirms the provincial legislation in force at its date. This is in substance the British contention, and, in the failure of the doctrine of reserved sovereignty, is the only alternative basis of the present proposition of the British Government.

The subject thus brought into dispute at this late date in the progress of the fishery negotiations between the two countries is simply what the fishery in provincial waters, which the British Government had at its disposal and which we acquired at its hand, as a matter of property and beneficial enjoyment, really was.

That the British proprietorship in and dominion over this inshore fishery was perfect, absolute, and without incumbrance or limitations, and that this was the subject concerning which the negotiations were occupied and by and to which the treaty equivalents were to be measured and applied was certainly never doubted by the negotiators of this treaty on the part of the United States or of Great Britain. Whatever this fishery was in its natural extent and value, in its geographical area, and its multitude and variety of fish products, that was the subject of which Great Britain possessed the jus disponendi and that the subject of which the United States proposed to acquire an undivided share. The proportion of this fishery which Great Britain was to part with and the United States was to appropriate does not affect the question of what the entire property was and was understood to be. Whatever the United States would have acquired had Great Britain parted with the whole fishery, the subject partitioned between them was this entirety, no matter what the shares in which it was to be enjoyed might be.

It is equally clear that the negotiators on both sides assumed that Great Britain was dealing with this subject as sole owner, and that it had impaired neither its title nor its possession by any previous grant or incumbrance. Whatever right and enjoyment then, by proprietorship and dominion, Great Britain in its political sovereignty could impart to "the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty," that right and enjoyment Great Britain could impart "to the inhabitants of the United States."

This being the subject of the grant, and this the title and possession of the grantor, what is the treaty description of the estate, right, and privilege granted to the United States for the enjoyment of its citizens? The text of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington shows that there was no limitation whatever upon the grant, except that the estate, right, and privilege granted were to endure but for a term of years, and were to be enjoyed by the United States not exclusively, but in common with Great Britain.

There was, to be sure, a restriction imposed upon both countries which excluded both equally from extending the enjoyment of either's share of the common fishery beyond the "inhabitants of the United States" on the one side and "Her Britannic Majesty's subjects" on the other, thus disabling either Government from impairing the share of the other by introducing foreign fishermen into the common fishery. But this feature in the grant has no significance in the measure of the concession as now disputed by Great Britain and contended for by the United States.

The British contention imputes to the phrase of the treaty, "in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty," not only its manifest effect of excluding any possible conclusion that the privilege conceded to the United States was exclusive, but the further effect of measuring the subject of the grant—that is, the fishery itself—as it was then, at the very date of the treaty, regulated by the various laws of the maritime provinces.

For this interpolation there seems no justification either in reason or in the history of the negotiation. There is not the least evidence that it was present to the mind of either of the high contracting parties to the treaty that the subject of the fishery to be partitioned between them was any less than such as it was in its natural dimensions and quality, and such as it was, as a subject of human control, at the unlimited disposal of British sovereignty. What these provincial laws were no one inquired and no one disclosed. That the fishery our sea-going fishermen were to share in, was a fishery regulated by and for the local population fishing from the shore, no one conceived. That the title of Great Britain should be examined, or warranty against adverse title and possession or against incumbrances exacted, would have seemed both foolish and offensive to the High Joint Commission which negotiated this treaty. To the apprehension of all the map and the statistics of the catch showed what the fishery was in extent and value, and the dominion of Great Britain over the subject measured the security of the right which we were to acquire.

The proposition of Lord Salisbury reduces the grant of the fishery from the dimensions of the fishery as Great Britain had power to convey it, and by its mere natural description would convey it, to the fishery as it had been trimmed and curtailed by local legislation and was to be regulated by local administration. He reduces our enjoyment from a freedom of the fishery, such as the plenary political power of Great Britain could impart to its subjects and could share with the United States, to be enjoyed by their inhabitants, to the use of the fishing methods and seasons of the provincial coast population, as their faculties and occasions had arranged them; and this interpretation of the subject of the grant, by which one party parted with and the other acquired nothing of value, turns upon the phrase of the treaty which defines the estate conveyed as not exclusive, but to be held in common.

Fortunately the closing transaction between the two Governments, by which the fishery concession to the United States was to be measured and valued, and compensation on our part therefor to be adjusted according to the measure and value of the provincial fishery, not in the abstract, but as opened to our fishermen, furnished an opportunity to take the estimate both of the British and provincial Governments of the extent and comprehension of the subject of the grant. This transaction antedates the present disputation and brings the two Governments together in a computation before the Halifax Commission of the nature, extent, and benefit of the inshore provincial fishery.

The considerations for the British concession were threefold. First, an equivalent fishery concession on our own coasts; second, exemption of provincial fish products from duties, or the concession of our free market; third, such supplemental money payment as the nature, extent, and value of the British fishery concession, in the judgment of the Halifax Commission, would warrant or require. It would be enough to say that the present pretensions of the British Government in reduction of the grant were not presented in depreciation of the price we were to pay, nor was any subjection of the natural fishery to political or municipal disparagement advanced by us in reduction of the money value with which we were to be charged. But the British and provincial governments are precluded from the present pretensions not by silence alone as to these latent limitations and incumbrances upon the grant, when its price was being adjusted by the Halifax award.

The "case" of the British Government presents in the most open and unequivocal terms the measure of the grant, in the sense both of benefit to the United States and of injury to the provincial fishermen. The conduct of the contention throughout maintained the freedom of the fishery to the methods and occasions of our fishing enterprise and skill, and insisted upon the right accorded (which might exhaust and destroy the fisheries so as to depreciate their benefit to the coast population, even beyond the treaty period), and not its actual exercise by our fishermen, as the standard of estimate by which our money payment was to be fixed.

In "the case of Her Majesty's Government," submitted to the Halifax Commission, the following language is used to illustrate and enforce the advantage in the extent and method of fishing secured by the treaty of 1871 over the restrictions of the convention of 1818:

"The convention of 1818 entitled United States citizens to fish on the shores of the Magdalen Islands, but denied them the privilege of landing there. Without such permission the practical use of the inshore fisheries was impossible. Although such permission has tacitly existed, as a matter of sufferance, it might at any moment have been withdrawn, and the operations of United States fishermen in that locality would thus have been rendered ineffectual. The value of these inshore fisheries is great; mackerel, herring, halibut, capelin, and launce abound, and are caught inside of the principal bays and harbors, where they resort to spawn. Between three hundred and four hundred United States fishing vessels yearly frequent the waters of this group, and take large quantities of fish, both for curing and bait. A single seine has been known to take at one haul enough of herring to fill 3,000 barrels. Seining mackerel is similarly productive. During the spring and summer fishery of the year 1875, when the mackerel were closer inshore than usual, the comparative failure of the American fishermen was owing to their being unprepared with suitable hauling nets and small boats, their vessels being unable to approach close enough to the beaches.

"In the case of the remaining portions of the seaboard of Canada, the terms of the convention of 1818 debarred United States citizens from landing at any part for the pursuit of operations connected with fishing. This privilege is essential to the successful prosecution of both the inshore and the deep-sea fisheries. By it they would be enabled to prepare their fish in a superior manner, in a salubrious climate, as well as more expeditiously, and they would be relieved of a serious embarrassment as regards the disposition of fish offals, by curing on shore the fish which otherwise would have been dressed on board their vessels, and the refuse thrown overboard.

"All the advantages above detailed have been secured for a period of twelve years to United States fishermen. Without them, fishing operations on many parts of the coast would be not only unremunerative but impossible; and they may therefore be claimed as an important item in the valuation of the liberties granted to the United States under Article XVIII of the treaty of Washington." (Halifax Commission, volume I, page 93.)

And again:

"4. Formation of fishing establishments.

"The privilege of establishing permanent fishing stations on the shores of Canadian bays, creeks, and harbors, akin to that of landing to dry and cure fish, is of material advantage to United States citizens.

* * * * * * *

"There are further advantages derivable from permanent establishments ashore, such as the accumulation of stock and fresh fish preserved in snow or ice, and others kept in frozen and fresh state by artificial freezing." (Ibid, pages 94, 95.)

In that portion of the same "case" which specially regards the character of the Newfoundland fishery, and points out with elaborate precision the rights of the United States fishermen on the shores of that island and the compensation demanded therefor, the British Government says:

"I. The entire freedom of the inshore fisheries.

"Newfoundland, from that part of its coast now thrown open to United States fishermen, yearly extracts, at the lowest estimate, $5,000,000 worth of fish and fish-oil, and when the value of fish used for bait and local consumption for food and agricultural purposes, of which there are no returns, is taken into account, the total may be fairly stated at $6,000,000 annually.

"It may possibly be contended on the part of the United States that their fishermen have not in the past availed themselves of the Newfoundland inshore fisheries, with but few exceptions, and that they would and do resort to the coasts of that island only for the purpose of procuring bait for the bank fishery. This may up to the present time to some extent be true as regards codfish, but not as regards herring, turbot, and halibut. It is not at all probable that, possessing as they now do the right to take herring and capelin for themselves on all parts of the Newfoundland coasts, they will continue to purchase as heretofore, and they will thus prevent the local fishermen, especially those of Fortune Bay, from engaging in a very lucrative employment, which formerly occupied them during a portion of the winter season for the supply of the United States market.

"The words of the treaty of Washington, in dealing with the question of compensation, make no allusion to what use the United States may or do make of the privileges granted them, but simply state that, inasmuch as it is asserted by Her Majesty's Government that the privileges accorded to the citizens of the United States under Article XVIII are of greater value than those accorded by Articles XIX and XXI to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, and this is not admitted by the United States, it is further agreed that a commission shall be appointed, having regard to the privileges accorded by the United States to Her Britannic Majesty's subjects in Articles Nos. XIX and XXI, the amount of any compensation to be paid by the Government of the United States to that of Her Majesty in return for the privileges accorded to the United States under Article XVIII.

"It is asserted, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that the actual use which may be made of this privilege at the present moment is not so much in question as the actual value of it to those who may, if they will, use it. It is possible and even probable, that United States fishermen may at any moment avail themselves of the privilege of fishing in Newfoundland inshore waters to a much larger extent than they do at present; but even if they should not do so, it would not relieve them from the obligation of making the just payment for a right which they have acquired subject to the condition of making that payment. The case may be not inaptly illustrated by the somewhat analogous one of a tenancy of shooting or fishing privileges; it is not because the tenant fails to exercise the rights which he has acquired by virtue of his lease that the proprietor should be debarred from the recovery of his rent.

"There is a marked contrast, to the advantage of the United States citizens, between the privilege of access to fisheries the most valuable and productive in the world, and the barren right accorded to the inhabitants of Newfoundland of fishing in the exhausted and preoccupied waters of the United States north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, in which there is no field for lucrative operations even if British subjects desired to resort to them; and there are strong grounds for believing that year by year, as United States fishermen resort in greater numbers to the coasts of Newfoundland for the purpose of procuring bait and supplies, they will become more intimately acquainted with the resources of the inshore fisheries and their unlimited capacity for extension and development. As a matter of fact, United States vessels have, since the Washington treaty came into operation, been successfully engaged in these fisheries; and it is but reasonable to anticipate that, as the advantages to be derived from them become more widely known, larger numbers of United States fishermen will engage in them.

"A participation by fishermen of the United States in the freedom of these waters must, notwithstanding their wonderfully reproductive capacity, tell materially on the local catch, and, while affording to the United States fishermen a profitable employment, must seriously interfere with local success. The extra amount of bait also which is required for the supply of the United States demand for the bank fishery must have the effect of diminishing the supply of cod for the inshores, as it is well known that the presence of that fish is caused by the attraction offered by a large quantity of bait fishes, and as this quantity diminishes the cod will resort in fewer number to the coast. The effect of this diminution may not in all probability be apparent for some years to come, and whilst United States fishermen will have the liberty of enjoying the fisheries for several years in their present teeming and remunerative state, the effects of overfishing may, after their right to participate in them has lapsed, become seriously prejudicial to the interests of the local fishermen. (Ib., pp. 103, 104.)

"It is impossible to offer more convincing testimony as to the value to United States fishermen of securing the right to use the coast of Newfoundland as a basis of operations for the bank fisheries than is contained in the declaration of one who has been for six years so occupied, sailing from the ports of Salem and Gloucester, in Massachusetts, and who declares that it is of the greatest importance to United States fishermen to procure from Newfoundland the bait necessary for those fisheries, and that such benefit can hardly be overestimated; that there will be during the season of 1876 upward of two hundred United States vessels in Fortune Bay for bait, and that there will be upward of three hundred vessels from the United States engaged in the Grand Bank fishery; that, owing to the great advantage of being able to run into Newfoundland for bait of different kinds, they are enabled to make four trips during the season; that the capelin, which may be considered as a bait peculiar to Newfoundland, is the best which can be used for this fishery, and that a vessel would probably be enabled to make two trips during the capelin season, which extends over a period of about six weeks. The same experienced deponent is of opinion that the bank fisheries are capable of immense expansion and development, and that the privilege of getting bait on the coast of Newfoundland is indispensable for the accomplishment of this object.

"As an instance of the demand for bait supplies derived from the Newfoundland inshore fisheries, it may be useful to state that the average amount of this article consumed by the French fishermen, who only prosecute the bank fisheries during a period of about six months of the year, is from $120,000 to $160,000 annually. The herring, capelin, and squid amply meet these requirements, and are supplied by the people of Fortune and Placentia Bays, the produce of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon being insufficient to meet the demand.

"It is evident from the above consideration that not only are the United States fishermen almost entirely dependent on the bait supply from Newfoundland, now open to them, for the successful prosecution of the bank fisheries, but also that they are enabled, through the privileges conceded to them by the treaty of Washington, to largely increase the number of their trips, and thus considerably augment the profits of the enterprise. This substantial advantage is secured at the risk, as before mentioned, of hereafter depleting the bait supplies of the Newfoundland inshores, and it is but just that a substantial equivalent should be paid by those who profit thereby.

"We are therefore warranted in submitting to the commissioners that not only should the present actual advantages derived on this head by United States fishermen be taken into consideration, but also the probable effect of the concessions made in their favor. The inevitable consequence of these concessions will be to attract a larger amount of United States capital and enterprise following the profits already made in this direction, and the effect will be to inflict an injury on the local fishermen, both by the increased demand on their sources of supply and by competition with them in their trade with foreign markets. (Ib., pages 105, 106.)

"CONCLUSION.

"It has thus been shown that under the treaty of Washington there has been conceded to the United States—

"First. The privilege of an equal participation in a fishery vast in area, teeming with fish, continuously increasing in productiveness, and now yielding to operatives, very limited in number when considered with reference to the field of labor, the large annual return of upwards of $6,000,000, of which 20 per cent. may be estimated at net profit, or $1,200,000.

"It is believed that the claim on the part of Newfoundland in respect of this portion of the privileges acquired by United States citizens under the treaty of Washington will be confined to the most moderate dimensions when estimated at one-tenth of this amount, namely, $120,000 per annum, or, for the twelve years of the operation of the treaty, a total sum of $1,440,000." (Ib., pages 107, 108.)

To this "case" the United States Government filed an answer, and the British Government filed a reply to the answer, in which it repeated its contention:

"The words 'for no other purpose whatever' are studiously omitted by the framers of the last-named treaty, and the privilege in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, to take fish and to land for fishing purposes, clearly includes the liberty to purchase bait and supplies, transship cargoes, etc., for which Her Majesty's Government contend it has a right to claim compensation.

"It is clear that these privileges were not enjoyed under the convention of 1818, and it is equally evident that they are enjoyed under the treaty of Washington. (Ib., page 173.)

* * * * * * *

"As regards the herring fishery on the coast of Newfoundland, it is availed of to a considerable extent by United States fishermen, and evidence will be adduced of large exportations by them in American vessels, particularly from Fortune Bay and the neighborhood, both to European and their own markets.

"The presence of United States fishermen upon the coast of Newfoundland, so far from being an advantage, as is assumed in the answer, operates most prejudicially to Newfoundland fishermen. Bait is not thrown overboard to attract the fish, as asserted, but the United States bank fishing vessels, visiting the coast in such large numbers as they do for the purpose of obtaining bait, sweep the coves, creeks, and inlets, thereby diminishing the supply of bait for local catch and scaring it from the grounds where it would otherwise be an attraction to the cod." (Ibid, page 186.)

It forms no part of my purpose in this report to adduce, in argument or proof, the manifold supports to the view now presented which the record of the diplomatic history of the fishery negotiations between the two countries or the documents and proceedings of the Halifax Commission contain. It is very apparent throughout them both that the obliteration of the sea-line of demarkation between the rights of our fishermen and those of British fishermen we regarded of principal value, as removing the sources of irritation between them and possible occasions of controversy and estrangement between the two nations. In my dispatch to Mr. Welsh of September 27, 1878, I laid before the British Government this disposition on our part as furnishing the leading purpose in the framing of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington. I then said that—

"Politically, and in the interest of good neighborhood, this Government did regard, and at all times would regard, the restoration of the relations between the two countries, in the common enjoyment of these fisheries, to the ancient footing of the treaty of 1783, as most grateful in sentiment and as a most valuable guaranty against any renewal of strife."

In the British "case" before the Halifax Commission, Her Majesty's Government definitely insisted upon this assured position of our public relations in this regard as an element of consideration in the award they asked from the Commission. Her Majesty's Government drew the attention of the Commissioners—

"To the great importance attaching to the beneficial consequences to the United States of honorably acquiring for their fishermen full freedom to pursue their adventurous calling without incurring constant risks and exposing themselves and their fellow countrymen to the inevitable reproach of wilfully trespassing on the rightful domain of friendly neighbors. Paramount, however, to this consideration is the avoidance of irritating disputes, calculated to disquiet the public mind of a spirited and enterprising people, and liable always to become a cause of mutual anxiety and embarrassment.

"It was repeatedly stated by the American members of the Joint High Commission at Washington, in discussing proposals regarding the Canadian fisheries, 'that the United States desired to secure their enjoyment, not for their commercial or intrinsic value, but for the purpose of removing a source of irritation.'"

The experience of our Fortune Bay fishermen in their first attempt, in the sixth year of the running of the treaty, to exercise on the coast of Newfoundland the "full freedom to pursue their adventurous calling," which Her Majesty's Government said had been honorably acquired for them by their own Government, is exhibited in the papers now submitted, as is also the treatment of their grievance, and this Government's presentation of it accorded by Her Majesty's Government.

The British Government claimed before the Halifax Commission the sum of $120,000 per annum during the twelve years of the treaty period, or the gross sum of $1,440,000, for the advantage to the United States of the fishing privilege proper on the Newfoundland coast alone, conceded by the treaty, over and above the counter concessions of our inshore fishery, and the remission of duty on their fish products. The Halifax award of $5,500,000, for the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland together, has been divided between them by the British Government, and the sum of $1,000,000 has been received by Newfoundland as its share of the money payment made by the United States under the treaty.

It will be observed that under the British view of the exposure of our fishermen at Fortune Bay to the penalties of infractions of the provincial laws, while they were enjoying in their own opinion and that of this Government the full freedom of the fishery accorded by the treaty, there is no pretense that the violence offered them and the wanton destruction of their fishing property and spoliation of their draught of fishes find any warrant in the supremacy of violated laws under color of which the British Government has refused them any indemnity.

In this attitude of the British Government, as taken in the correspondence, the violent expulsion of our fishermen from their fishery on the 6th of January, 1878, by the coast fishermen of Newfoundland, seems to be justified if not espoused. This position, too, of that Government necessarily carries a warning that any future attempt by our fishermen to exercise their treaty privilege, except in conformity to the local fishing regulations, will be resisted by the authority of the British Government, as well as exposed to the violence of the coast fishermen.

Under this unhappy and unexpected failure of accord between the two Governments as to the measure of the inshore fishing privilege secured to our fishermen by the treaty of Washington, as developed in this correspondence, it becomes the imperative duty of this Government to consider what measures should be taken to maintain the rights of our people under the treaty, as we understand them, and to obtain redress for their expulsion from the enjoyment of their rights.

So far as this diminution of these privileges calls for a reconsideration of the treaty equivalents already parted with by this Government and received by Great Britain, as suitable to the failure of the privileges thus purchased and paid for, by this denial of their exercise so as to be valuable or desirable to our people, that subject necessarily must be remitted to diplomatic correspondence. The only continuing consideration the United States is paying for the treaty period, for the expected enjoyment of the treaty concession, is the remission of our customs duties upon the fish products of the provincial share in these fisheries. I respectfully advise that it be recommended to Congress to reimpose the duties upon fish and fish-oil, the products of the provincial fisheries, as they existed before the treaty of Washington came into operation, to so continue until the two Governments shall be in accord as to the interpretation and execution of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, and in the adjustment of the grievance of our fishermen from the infractions of their rights under that treaty.

This measure will give to our fishermen, while excluded from the enjoyment of the inshore fisheries under the continued enforcement of the British interpretation of the treaty, a restoration of the domestic market for the products of their own fishing industry, as it stood before its freedom was thrown open to the provincial fishermen in exchange for the free fishery opened to our fishermen.

I respectfully advise, also, submitting to the consideration of Congress the propriety of authorizing the examination and auditing of the claims of our fishermen for injuries suffered by the infraction or denial of their treaty privileges, with the view of some ultimate provision by convention with Great Britain or by this Government for their indemnity.

WM. M. EVARTS.

Mr. Evarts to Mr. Welsh.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 1, 1879.

SIR: You will readily understand that the pressure of current business, especially during the regular and special sessions of Congress, has prevented so immediate attention to the claims of the Fortune Bay fishermen, as definitely laid before me in their proofs completed during the session, as would enable me to give, in reply, a full consideration to the dispatch of Lord Salisbury of the date of November 7, 1878, in reply to mine to you of 28th September, 1878.

But other and stronger reasons have also induced me to postpone until now any discussion of the questions arising out of the occurrences to which these dispatches referred.

It so happened that the transactions of which certain citizens of the United States complain were brought fully to the attention of the Government about the same time at which it became my duty to lay before Her Britannic Majesty's Government the views of the United States Government as to the award then recently made by the Commission on the Fisheries, which had just closed its sittings at Halifax. While the character of the complaint and the interests of the citizens of the United States rendered it necessary that the subject should be submitted to the consideration of Her Britannic Majesty's Government at the earliest possible moment, in order to the prevention of any further and graver misunderstanding and the avoidance of any serious interruption to an important industry, I was exceedingly unwilling that the questions arising under the award and those provoked by the occurrences in Newfoundland should be confused with each other, and least of all would I have been willing that the simultaneous presentment of the views of this Government should be construed as indicating any desire on our part to connect the settlement of these complaints with the satisfaction or abrogation of the Halifax award.

I also deemed it not unadvisable in the interests of such a solution as I am sure is desired by the good sense and good temper of both Governments that time should be allowed for the extinguishment of the local irritation both here and in Newfoundland which these transactions seem to have excited, and that another fishing season should more clearly indicate whether the rights to which the citizens of the United States were entitled under the treaty were denied or diminished by the pretensions and acts of the colonial authorities or whether their infraction was accidental and temporary. As soon as the violence to which citizens of the United States has been subjected in Newfoundland was brought to the attention of this Department, I instructed you, on 2d March, 1878, to represent the matter to Her Britannic Majesty's Government, and upon such representation you were informed that a prompt investigation would be ordered for the information of that Government.

On August 23, 1878, Lord Salisbury conveyed to you, to be transmitted to your Government, the result of that investigation, in the shape of a report from Captain Sulivan, of Her Majesty's ship Sirius. In furnishing you with this report, Lord Salisbury, on behalf of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, said:

"You will perceive that the report in question appears to demonstrate conclusively that the United States fishermen on this occasion had committed three distinct breaches of the law, and that no violence was used by the Newfoundland fishermen, except in the case of one vessel, whose master refused to comply with the request which was made to him that he should desist from fishing on Sunday in violation of the law of the colony and of the local custom, and who threatened the Newfoundland fishermen with a revolver, as detailed in paragraphs 5 and 6 of Captain Sulivan's report."

The three breaches of the law thus reported by Captain Sulivan and assumed by Lord Salisbury as conclusively established, were: 1. The use of seines and the use of them also at a time prohibited by colonial statute. 2. Fishing upon a day (Sunday) forbidden by the same local law; and 3. Barring fish in violation of the same local legislation. In addition Captain Sulivan reported that the United States fishermen were, contrary to the terms of the treaty of Washington—

"Fishing illegally, interfering with the rights of British fishermen and their peaceable use of that part of the coast then occupied by them and of which they were actually in possession—their seines and boats, their huts and gardens and land granted by Government being situated thereon."

Yours, containing this dispatch and the accompanying report, was received on 4th September, 1878, and on the 28th of the same month you were instructed that it was impossible for this Government duly to appreciate the value of Captain Sulivan's report, until it was permitted to see the testimony upon which the conclusions of that report professed to rest. And you were further directed to say that, putting aside for after examination the variations of fact, it seemed to this Government that the assumption of the report was that the United States fishermen were fishing illegally, because their fishing was being conducted at a time and by methods forbidden by certain colonial statutes; that the language of Lord Salisbury, in communicating the report with his approval, indicated the intention of Her Britannic Majesty's Government to maintain the position, that the treaty privileges secured to United States fishermen by the treaty of 1871 were held subject to such limitations as might be imposed upon their exercise by colonial legislation; and "that so grave a question, in its bearing upon the obligations of this Government under the treaty, makes it necessary that the President should ask from Her Majesty's Government a frank avowal or disavowal of the paramount authority of provincial legislation to regulate the enjoyment by our people of the inshore fishery, which seems to be intimated, if not asserted, in Lord Salisbury's note."

In reply to this communication, Lord Salisbury, 7th November, 1878, transmitted to you the depositions which accompanied Captain Sulivan's report, and said:

"In pointing out that the American fishermen had broken the law within the territorial limits of Her Majesty's domains, I had no intention of inferentially laying down any principles of international law, and no advantage would, I think, be gained by doing so to a greater extent than the facts in question absolutely require. * * * Her Majesty's Government will readily admit—what is, indeed, self-evident—that British sovereignty, as regards those waters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the treaty of Washington, which can not be modified or affected by any municipal legislation."

It is with the greatest pleasure that the United States Government receives this language as "the frank disapproval" which it asked "of the paramount authority of provincial legislation to regulate the enjoyment by our people of the inshore fishery."

Removing, as this explicit language does, the only serious difficulty which threatened to embarrass this discussion, I am now at liberty to resume the consideration of these differences in the same spirit and with the same hopes so fully and properly expressed in the concluding paragraph of Lord Salisbury's dispatch. He says:

"It is not explicitly stated in Mr. Evarts's dispatch that he considers any recent acts of the colonial legislature to be inconsistent with the rights acquired by the United States under the treaty of Washington. But if that is the case, Her Majesty's Government will, in a friendly spirit, consider any representations he may think it right to make upon the subject, with the hope of coming to a satisfactory understanding."

It is the purpose, therefore, of the present dispatch to convey to you, in order that they may be submitted to Her Britannic Majesty's Government, the conclusions which have been reached by the Government of the United States as to the rights secured to its citizens under the treaty of 1871 in the herring fishery upon the Newfoundland coast, and the extent to which those rights have been infringed by the transactions in Fortune Bay on January 6, 1878.

Before doing so, however, I deem it proper, in order to clear the argument of all unnecessary issues, to correct what I consider certain misapprehensions of the views of this Government contained in Lord Salisbury's dispatch of 7th of November, 1878. The secretary for foreign affairs of Her Britannic Majesty says:

"If, however, it be admitted that the Newfoundland Legislature have the right of binding Americans who fish within their waters by any laws which do not contravene existing treaties, it must be further conceded that the duty of determining the existence of such contravention must be undertaken by the governments, and can not be remitted to the discretion of each individual fisherman. For such discretion, if exercised on one side, can hardly be refused on the other. If any American fisherman may violently break a law which he believes to be contrary to treaty, a Newfoundland fisherman may violently maintain it if he believes it to be in accordance with treaty."

His lordship can scarcely have intended this last proposition to be taken in its literal significance. An infraction of law may be accompanied by violence which affects the person or property of an individual, and that individual may be warranted in resisting such illegal violence, so far as it directly affects him, without reference to the relation of the act of violence to the law which it infringes, but simply as a forcible invasion of his rights of person or property. But that the infraction of a general municipal law, with or without violence, can be corrected and punished by a mob, without official character or direction, and who assume both to interpret and administer the law in controversy, is a proposition which does not require the reply of elaborate argument between two governments whose daily life depends upon the steady application of the sound and safe principles of English jurisprudence. However this may be, the Government of the United States can not for a moment admit that the conduct of the United States fishermen in Fortune Bay was in any—the remotest degree—a violent breach of law

Granting any and all the force which may be claimed for the colonial legislation, the action of the United States fishermen was the peaceable prosecution of an innocent industry, to which they thought they were entitled. Its pursuit invaded no man's rights, committed violence upon no man's person, and if trespassing beyond its lawful limits could have been promptly and quietly stopped by the interference and representations of the lawfully constituted authorities. They were acting under the provisions of the very statute which they are alleged to have violated, for it seems to have escaped the attention of Lord Salisbury that section 28 of the title of the consolidated acts referred to contains the provision that "Nothing in this chapter shall affect the rights and privileges granted by treaty to the subjects of any state or power in amity with Her Majesty."

They were engaged, as I shall hereafter demonstrate, in a lawful industry, guarantied by the treaty of 1871, in a method which was recognized as legitimate by the award of the Halifax Commission, the privilege to exercise which their Government had agreed to pay for. They were forcibly stopped, not by legal authority, but by mob violence. They made no resistance, withdrew from the fishing grounds, and represented the outrage to their Government, thus acting in entire conformity with the principle as justly stated by Lord Salisbury himself, that—

"If it be admitted, however, that the Newfoundland Legislature have the right of binding Americans who fish within their waters by any laws which do not contravene existing treaties, it must be further conceded that the duty of determining the existence of such contravention must be undertaken by the Governments, and can not be remitted to the judgment of each individual fisherman."

There is another passage of Lord Salisbury's dispatch to which I should call your attention. Lord Salisbury says:

"I hardly believe, however, that Mr. Evarts would in discussion adhere to the broad doctrine, which some portion of his language would appear to convey, that no British authority has a right to pass any kind of laws binding Americans who are fishing in British waters; for if that contention be just the same disability applies a fortiori to any other powers, and the waters must be delivered over to anarchy."

I certainly can not recall any language of mine in this correspondence which is capable of so extraordinary a construction. I have nowhere taken any position larger or broader than that which Lord Salisbury says:

"Her Majesty's Government will readily admit, what is, indeed, self-evident, that British sovereignty, as regards these waters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the treaty of Washington, which can not be affected or modified by any municipal legislature."

I have never denied the full authority and jurisdiction, either of the imperial or colonial governments, over their territorial waters, except so far as by treaty that authority and jurisdiction have been deliberately limited by these governments themselves. Under no claim or authority suggested or advocated by me could any other government demand exemption from the provisions of British or colonial law, unless that exemption was secured by treaty; and if these waters must be delivered over to anarchy, it will not be in consequence of any pretensions of the United States Government, but because the British Government has, by its own treaties, to use Lord Salisbury's phrase, limited the scope of British sovereignty. I am not aware of any such treaty engagements with other powers, but if there are, it would be neither my privilege nor duty to consider or criticise their consequences where the interests of the United States are not concerned.

After careful comparison of all the depositions furnished to both governments, the United States Government is of opinion that the following facts will not be disputed:

1. That twenty-two vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, namely, Fred. P. Frye, Mary and M., Lizzie and Namari, Edward E. Webster, W. E. McDonald, Crest of the Wave, F. A. Smith, Hereward, Moses Adams, Charles E. Warren, Moro Castle, Wildfire, Maud and Effie, Isaac Rich, Bunker Hill, Bonanza, H. M. Rogers, Moses Knowlton, John W. Bray, Maud B. Wetherell, New England, and Ontario, went from Gloucester, a town in Massachusetts, United States, to Fortune Bay, in Newfoundland, in the winter of 1877–'78, for the purpose of procuring herring.

2. That these vessels waited at Fortune Bay for several weeks (from about December 15, 1877, to January 6, 1878), for the expected arrival of schools of herring in that harbor.

3. That on Sunday, January 6, 1878, the herring entered the bay in great numbers; and that four of the vessels sent their boats with seines to commence fishing operations, and the others were proceeding to follow.

4. That the parties thus seining were compelled, by a large and violent mob of the inhabitants of Newfoundland, to take up their seines, discharge the fish already inclosed, aud abandon their fishery, and that in one case, at least, the seine was absolutely destroyed.

5. That these seines were being used in the interest of all the United States vessels waiting for cargoes in the harbor, and that the catch undisturbed would have been sufficient to load all of them with profitable cargoes. The great quantity of fish in the harbor, and the fact that the United States vessels if permitted to fish would all have obtained full cargoes, is admitted in the British depositions.

"If the Americans had been allowed to secure all the herrings in the bay for themselves, which they could have done that day, they would have filled all their vessels, and the neighboring fishermen would have lost all chance on the following week day. (Deposition of James Searwell.)

"The Americans by hauling herring that day, when the Englishmen could not, were robbing them of their lawful and just chance of securing their share in them; and further, had they secured all they had barred, they would, I believe, have filled every vessel of theirs in the bay." (Deposition of John Chutt.)

See also affidavits of the United States captains.

6. That in consequence of this violence all the vessels abandoned the fishing grounds, some without cargoes, some with very small cargoes, purchased from the natives, and their voyages were a loss to their owners.

7. That the seining was conducted at a distance from any land or fishing privilege or the occupation of any British subject. (See affidavits of Willard G. Rode, Charles Doyle, and Michael B. Murray.)

8. That none of the United States vessels made any further attempts to fish, but three or four which were delayed in the neighborhood purchased small supplies of herring. (See British depositions of John Saunders and Silas Fudge, wherein is stated that the United States vessels only remained a few days, and that after January 6 no fish came into the harbor.)

All the United States affidavits show that the United States vessels were afraid to use their seines after this, and that they left almost immediately, most of them coming home in ballast.

The provisions of the treaty of Washington (1871), by which the right to prosecute this fishery was secured to the citizens of the United States, are very simple and very explicit.

The language of the treaty is as follows:

"XVIII. It is agreed by the high contracting parties that in addition to the liberties secured to the United States fishermen by the convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at London on the 20th day of October, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies, therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, the liberty for the term of years mentioned in Article XXXIII of this treaty to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea coast and shores and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of the provinces of Quebec, etc.

"XXXII. It is further agreed that the provisions and stipulations of Articles XVIII to XXV of this treaty, inclusive, shall extend to the colony of Newfoundland, so far as they are applicable."

Title XXVIII, chapter 102, of the consolidated acts of Newfoundland, provides:

"SEC. 1. That no person shall take herring on the coast of Newfoundland by a seine or other such contrivance, at any time between the 20th day of October and the 12th day of April, in any year, or at any time use a seine except by way of shooting and forthwith hauling the seine.

"SEC. 2. That no person shall, at any time, between the 20th day of December and the 1st day of April, in any year, catch or take herring with seines of less than 2¼ inches mesh, etc.

"SEC. 4. No person shall, between the 20th day of April and the 20th day of October, in any year, haul, catch, or take herring or other bait for exportation within 1 mile, measured by the shore across the water, of any settlement situated between Cape Chapeau Rouge and Point Emajer, near Cape Ray."

The act of 1876 provides that—

"No person shall, between the hours of 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 12 o'clock on Sunday night, haul or take any herring, caplin, or squid, with net, seine, bunts, or any such contrivance for the purpose of such hauling or taking."

It seemed scarcely necessary to do more than place the provisions of the treaty and the provisions of these laws in contrast, and apply the principle so precisely and justly announced by Lord Salisbury as self-evident, "that British sovereignty, as regards those waters, is limited in its scope by the engagements of the treaty of Washington, which can not be modified or affected by any municipal legislation." For it will not be denied that the treaty privilege of "taking fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the seacoast and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks" of Newfoundland is both seriously "modified" and injuriously affected by municipal legislation, which closes such fishery absolutely for seven months of the year, prescribes a special method of exercise, forbids exportation for five months, and, in certain localities, absolutely limits the 3-mile area, which it was the express purpose of the treaty to open.

But this is not all. When the treaty of 1871 was negotiated, the British Government contended that the privilege extended to United States fishermen of free fishing within the 3-mile territorial limit was so much more valuable than the equivalent offered in the treaty that a money compensation should be added to equalize the exchange. The Halifax Commission was appointed for the special purpose of determining that compensation, and, in order to do so, instituted an exhaustive examination of the history and value of the colonial fisheries, including the herring fishery of Newfoundland.

Before that commission, the United States Government contended that the frozen-herring fishery in Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, the very fishery now under discussion, was not a fishery, but a traffic; that the United States vessels which went there for herring always took out trading permits from the United States custom-house, which no other fishermen did; that the herring were caught by the natives in their nets and sold to the vessels, the captains of which froze the herring after purchase, and transported them to market, and that consequently this was a trade, a commerce beneficial to the Newfoundlanders, and not to be debited to the United States account of advantages gained by the treaty.

To this the British Government replied, that whatever the character of the business had been, the treaty now gave the United States fishermen the right to catch as well as purchase herring; that the superior character of the United States vessels, the larger capacity and more efficient instrumentality of the seines used by the United States fishermen, together with their enterprise and energy, would all induce the United States fishermen to catch herring for themselves, and thus the treaty gave certain privileges to the United States fishermen, which inflicted upon the original proprietor a certain amount of loss and damage, from this dangerous competition, which, in justice to their interests, required compensation. The exercise of these privileges, therefore, as stated in the British case, as evidenced in the British testimony, as maintained in the British argument, for which the British Government demanded and received compensation, is the British construction of the extent of the liberty to fish in common, guarantied by the treaty.

Mr. Whiteway, then attorney-general of Newfoundland, and one of the British counsel before the commission, said in his argument:

"And now one word with regard to the winter herring fishery in Fortune Bay. It appears that from forty to fifty United States vessels proceed there between the months of November and February, taking from thence cargoes of frozen herring of from 500 to 800 or 1,000 barrels. According to the evidence, these herrings have hitherto generally been obtained by purchase. It is hardly possible, then, to conceive that the Americans will continue to buy, possessing as they now do the right to catch."

The British case states the argument as to the Newfoundland fisheries in the following language:

"It is asserted on the part of Her Majesty's Government that the actual use which may be made of this privilege at the present moment is not so much in question as the actual value of it to those who may, if they will, use it. It is possible, and even probable, that the United States fishermen may at any moment avail themselves of the privilege of fishing in Newfoundland inshore waters to a much larger extent than they do at present; but even if they should not do so, it would not relieve them from the obligation of making the just payment for a right which they have acquired subject to the condition of making that payment. The case may be not inaptly illustrated by the somewhat analogous one of a tenancy of shooting or fishing privileges; it is not because the tenant fails to exercise the rights which he has acquired by virtue of his lease that the proprietor should be debarred from the recovery of his rent.

"There is a marked contrast to the advantage of the United States citizens between the privilege of access to fisheries the most valuable and productive in the world and the barren right accorded to the inhabitants of Newfoundland, of fishing in the exhausted and preoccupied waters of the United States, north of the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, in which there is no field for lucrative operations, even if British subjects desired to resort to them; and there are strong grounds for believing that year by year, as United States fishermen resort in greater numbers to the coasts of Newfoundland for the purpose of procuring bait and supplies, they will become more intimately acquainted with the resources of the inshore fisheries and their unlimited capacity for extension and development. As a matter of fact United States vessels have, since the Washington treaty came into operation, been successfully engaged in these fisheries, and it is but reasonable to anticipate that as the advantages to be derived from them become more widely known larger numbers of United States fishermen will engage in them.

"A participation by fishermen of the United States in the freedom of these waters must, notwithstanding their wonderfully reproductive capacity, tell materially on the local catch, and while affording to the United States fishermen a profitable employment, must seriously interfere with local success. The extra amount of bait also which is required for the supply of the United States demand for the bank fishery must have the effect of diminishing the supply of cod for the inshores, as it is well known that the presence of that fish is caused by the attraction offered by a large quantity of bait fishes, and as this quantity diminishes the cod will resort in fewer numbers to the coast.

"The effect of this diminution may not in all probability be apparent for some years to come, and whilst United States fishermen will have the liberty of enjoying the fisheries for several years in their present teeming and remunerative state, the effects of overfishing may, after their right to participate in them has lapsed, become seriously prejudicial to the interests of the local fishermen.

"II. The privilege of procuring bait and supplies, refitting, drying, transshipping, etc.

"Apart from the immense value to United States fishermen of participation in the Newfoundland inshore fisheries must be estimated the important privilege of procuring bait for the prosecution of the bank and deep-sea fisheries, which are capable of unlimited expansion. With Newfoundland as a basis of operations, the right of procuring bait, refitting their vessels, drying and curing fish, procuring ice in abundance for the preservation of bait, liberty of transshipping their cargoes, etc., an almost continuous prosecution of the bank fishery is secured to them. By means of these advantages United States fishermen have acquired by the treaty of Washington all the requisite facilities for increasing their fishing operations to such an extent as to enable them to supply the demand for fish food in the United States markets, and largely to furnish the other fish markets of the world, and thereby exercise a competition which must inevitably prejudice Newfoundland exporters.

"It must be remembered, in contrast with the foregoing, that United States fishing craft, before the conclusion of the treaty of Washington, could only avail themselves of the coast of Newfoundland for obtaining a supply of wood and water, for shelter, and for necessary repairs in case of accident, and for no other purpose whatever. They therefore prosecuted the bank fishery under great disadvantages, notwithstanding which, owing to the failure of the United States local fisheries, and the consequent necessity of providing new fishing grounds, the bank fisheries have developed into a lucrative source of employment to the fishermen of the United States.

"That this position is appreciated by those actively engaged in the bank fishery is attested by the statement of competent witnesses, whose evidence will be laid before the commission:"

And in the reply of the British Government, referring to the same Newfoundland fisheries, is the following declaration:

"As regards the herring fishery on the coast of Newfoundland, it is availed of to a considerable extent by the United States fishermen, and evidence will be adducted of large exportations by them in American vessels, particularly from Fortune Bay and the neighborhood, both to European and their own markets.

"The presence of United States fishermen upon the coast of Newfoundland, so far from being an advantage, as is assumed in the answer, operates most prejudicially to Newfoundland fishermen. Bait is not thrown overboard to attract the fish, as asserted, but the United States bank fishing vessels, visiting the coast in such large numbers as they do for the purpose of obtaining bait, sweep the coast, creeks, and inlets, thereby diminishing the supply of bait for local catch and scaring it from the grounds, where it would otherwise be an attraction for cod."

In support of these views, the most abundant testimony was produced by the British Government showing the extent of the United States herring fishery, the character and construction of the seines used, the time when the vessels came and left, and the employment of the native fishermen by the United States vessels. And it follows unanswerably that upon the existence of that fishery between the months of October and April (the very time prohibited by the colonial law), and upon the use of just such seines as were used by the complainants in this case (the very seines forbidden by the colonial law), and because the increasing direct fishery of the United States vessels was interfering with native methods and native profits, the British Government demanded and received compensation for the damages thus alleged to proceed from "the liberty to take fish of every kind" secured by the treaty.

This Government can not anticipate that the British Government will now contend that the time and method for which it asked and received compensation are forbidden by the terms of the very treaty under which it made the claim and received the payment. Indeed, the language of Lord Salisbury justifies the Government of the United States in drawing the conclusion that between itself and Her Britannic Majesty's Government there is no substantial difference in the construction of the privileges of the treaty of 1871, and that in the future the colonial regulation of the fisheries with which, as far as their own interests are concerned, we have neither right nor desire to intermeddle, will not be allowed to modify or affect the rights which have been guarantied to citizens of the United States.

You will therefore say to Lord Salisbury that the Government of the United States considers the engagements of the treaty of 1871 contravened by the local legislation of Newfoundland, by the prohibition of the use of seines, by the closing of the fishery with seines between October and April, by the forbidding of fishing for the purpose of exportation between December and April, by the prohibition to fish on Sunday, by the allowance of nets of only a specified mesh, and by the limitation of the area of fishing between Cape Ray and Cape Chapeau Rouge. Of course this is only upon the supposition that such laws are considered as applying to United States fishermen. As local regulations for native fishermen we have no concern with them. The contravention consists in excluding United States fishermen during the very times in which they have been used to pursue this industry, and forbidding the methods by which alone it can be properly carried on.

The exclusion of the time from October to April covers the only season in which frozen herring can be procured, while the prohibition of the seines would interfere with the vessels, who, occupied in cod-fishing during the summer, go to Fortune Bay in the winter, and would consequently have to make a complete change in their fishing gear, or depend entirely upon purchase from the natives for their supply. The prohibition of work on Sunday is impossible under the conditions of the fishery. The vessels must be at Fortune Bay at a certain time, and leave for market at a certain time. The entrance of the schools of herring ts uncertain, and the time they stay equally so. Whenever they come they must be caught, and the evidence in this very case shows that after Sunday, the 6th of January, there was no other influx of these fish, and that prohibition on that day would have been equivalent to shutting out the fishermen for the season.

If I am correct in the views hitherto expressed, it follows that the United States Government must consider the United States fishermen as engaged in a lawful industry, from which they were driven by lawless violence at great loss and damage to them; and that as this was in violation of rights guarantied by the treaty of Washington, between Great Britain and the United States, they have reasonable ground to expect at the hands of Her Britannic Majesty's Government proper compensation for the loss they have sustained. The United States Government, of course, desires to avoid an exaggerated estimate of the loss which has been actually sustained, but thinks you will find the elements for a fair calculation in the sworn statement of the owners, copies of which are herewith sent. You will find in the printed pamphlet which accompanies this, and which is the statement submitted to this Department on behalf of twenty of the vessels, the expense of each vessel in preparation for the fishery and her estimated loss and damage.

The same statement with regard to the two vessels New England and Ontario, not included in this list of twenty, you will find attached hereto, thus making a complete statement for the twenty-two vessels which were in Fortune Bay on the 6th of January, 1878, and the Government of the United States sees no reason to doubt the accuracy of these estimates. I find upon examining the testimony of one of the most intelligent of the Newfoundland witnesses called before the Halifax Commission by the British Government, Judge Bennett, formerly speaker of the colonial house, and himself largely interested in the business, that he estimates the Fortune Bay business in frozen herring, in the former years of purchase, at 20,000 to 25,000 barrels for the season and that it was increasing, and this is confirmed by others.

The evidence in this case shows that the catch which the United States fishing fleet had on this occasion actually realized was exceptionally large and would have supplied profitable cargoes for all of them. When to this is added the fact that the whole winter was lost and these vessels compelled to return home in ballast; that this violence had such an effect on this special fishery that in the winter of 1·78–'79 it has been almost entirely abandoned, and the former fleet of twenty-six vessels had been reduced to eight, none of whom went provided with seines, but were compelled to purchase their fish of the inhabitants of Newfoundland, the United States Government is of opinion that $105,305.02 may be presented as an estimate of the loss as claimed, and you will consider that amount as being what this Government will regard as adequate compensation for loss and damage.

In conclusion, I would not be doing justice to the wishes and opinions of the United States Government if I did not express its profound regret at the apparent conflict of interests which the exercise of its treaty privileges appears to have developed. There is no intention on the part of this Government that these privileges should be abused and no desire that their full and free enjoyment should harm the colonial fishermen. While the differing interests and methods of the shore fishery and the vessel fishery make it impossible that the regulation of the one should be entirely given to the other, yet if the mutual obligations of the treaty of 1871 are to be maintained the United States Government would gladly co-operate with the Government of Her Britannic Majesty in any effort to make those regulations a matter of reciprocal convenience and right; a means of preserving the fisheries at their highest point of production and of conciliating a community of interest by a just proportion of advantages and profits.

I am, etc.,

WM. M. EVARTS.

[Inclosure 1, with No. 170.]

The Marquis of Salisbury to Mr. Hoppin.

FOREIGN OFFICE, April 3, 1880.

SIR: In the note which I had the honor to address to you on the 12th of February I explained the reason why a certain time has unavoidably elapsed before Her Majesty's Government were in a position to reply to Mr. Welsh's notes of the 13th of August last, in which he preferred, on the part of your Government, a claim for $105,305.02, as compensation to some United States fishermen, on account of losses stated to have been sustained by them through certain occurrences which took place at Fortune Bay, Newfoundland, on the 6th of January, 1878. The delay which has arisen has been occasioned by the necessity of instituting a very careful inquiry into the circumstances of the case, to which, in all its bearings, Her Majesty's Government were anxious to give the fullest consideration before coming to a decision. Her Majesty's Government having now completed that inquiry, so far as lies within their power, I beg leave to request you to be so good as to communicate to your Government the following observations on the case.

In considering whether compensation can properly be demanded and paid in this case, regard must be had to the facts as established, and to the intent and effect of the articles of the treaty of Washington and the convention of 1818 which are applicable to those facts.

* * * * * * *

I have the honor to inclose a copy of an act passed by the colonial legislature of Newfoundland, on the 27th March, 1862, for the protection of the herring and salmon fisheries on the coast, and a copy of cap. 102 of the consolidated statutes of Newfoundland, passed in 1872. The first section of the act of 1862, prohibited the taking of herrings with a seine between the 20th day of October and the 12th day of April, and, further, prohibited the use of seines at any time for the purpose of barring herrings. These regulations, which were in force at the date of the treaty of Washington, were not abolished, but confirmed by the subsequent statutes, and are binding under the treaty upon the citizens of the United States in common with British subjects.

The United States fishermen, therefore, in landing for the purpose of fishing at Tickle Beach, in using a seine at a prohibited time, and in barring herrings with seines from the shore exceeded their treaty privileges, and were engaged in unlawful acts.

Her Majesty's Government have no wish to insist on any illiberal construction of the language of the treaty, and would not consider it necessary to make any formal complaint on the subject of a casual infringement of the letter of its stipulations which did not involve any substantial detriment to British interests and to the fishery in general.

An excess on the part of the United States fishermen of the precise limits of the rights secured to them might proceed as much from ignorance as from wilfulness; but the present claim for compensation is based on losses resulting from a collision which was the direct consequence of such excess, and Her Majesty's Government feel bound to point to the fact that the United States fishermen were the first and real cause of the mischief, by overstepping the limits of the privileges secured to them in a manner gravely prejudicial to the rights of other fishermen.

For the reasons above stated, Her Majesty's Government are of the opinion that, under the circumstances of the case as at present within their knowledge, the claim advanced by the United States fishermen for compensation on account of the losses stated to have been sustained by them on the occasion in question is one which should not be entertained.

Mr. Evarts will not require to be assured that Her Majesty's Government, while unable to admit the contention of the United States Government on the present occasion, are fully sensible of the evils arising from any difference of opinion between the two governments in regard to the fishery rights of their respective subjects. They have always admitted the incompetence of the colonial or the imperial legislature to limit by subsequent legislation the advantages secured by treaty to the subjects of another power. If it should be the opinion of the Government of the United States that any act of the colonial legislature subsequent in date to the treaty of Washington has trenched upon the rights enjoyed by the citizens of the United States in virtue of that instrument, Her Majesty's Government will consider any communication addressed to them in that view with a cordial and anxious desire to remove all just grounds of complaint,

I have, etc.,

SALISBURY.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. EVARTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. It is exceedingly hot, and the Senator has been talking now certainly over two hours.

Mr. EVARTS. Three hours.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to ask the Senator from New York whether he would not rather continue on another day.

Mr. EVARTS. I have perhaps gone as far as I feel able to-day.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. EVARTS. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from New York think that we were worried into the treaty of 1871 and teased into it, as he says we were into the treaty of 1854?

Mr. EVARTS. I was just entering on that. It had just come to my lips.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of ordinary legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that he had been directed to return to the Senate the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., and the conference report on said bill.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1701) authorizing the construction of a high wagon-bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa; further insisted on its amendment to the bill; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CRISP, Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, and Mr. PHELAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the heat is so intense and the atmosphere so oppressive that I think we shall do the public more good by adjourning than by going on with that bill now, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont to withdraw that motion for a moment in order that we may have a brief executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw it for that purpose.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OMAHA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Chair to place before the Senate a bill received from the House of Representatives on which a conference is desired, being a bill for a public building at Omaha.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives further insisting upon its amendments to the bill (S. 182) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Omaha, Nebr., and asking a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON. In the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who has that bill in charge, and for him, I move that the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the bill and that another conference be appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1701) authorizing the construction of a high wagon bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Sioux City, Iowa, further insisting on its amendment to the bill, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know it is the purpose of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to move insistance on the Senate amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri so notified the Chair.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WILSON of Iowa were appointed.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. VANCE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 9, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 8, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GALLINGER, until September 15, on account of important business.

To Mr. HALL, for four days, on account of the death of a friend.

To Mr. STOCKDALE, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5067) establishing additional aids to navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi River; and

A bill (H. R. 1508) for the relief of certain appointed or enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps from the charge of desertion.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The House last evening was considering Senate bill 2182, and the previous question on the third reading of the bill having been ordered, the vote taken on the third reading of the bill showed no quorum present. My question is whether that bill does not at this time have the right of way as against other business?

The SPEAKER. It does not, under the practice of the House. The practice has always been that when the previous question has been ordered upon the passage of a bill and there has been an adjournment before taking the vote, the bill comes up for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal on the next morning; but the practice has never extended beyond that point, and where the previous question is ordered merely upon ordering a bill to be engrossed and read a third time and the House adjourns, the bill takes its place as unfinished business in the class of business to which it belongs.

Mr. BURNES. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask my friend to withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can not we dispense with the call of committees for reports this morning?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] demands the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the call of committees, and that gentlemen having reports to present may have leave to file them with the Clerk.

Mr. BURNES. In consequence of serious illness in the family of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], I withdraw at his request the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7595) for the erection of a public building at the city of Kalamazoo, Mich.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]?

Mr. OATES. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A bill (S. 3181) to remove the political disabilities of Julian Myers; and

A bill (S. 3196) for the relief of Joseph G. Swank.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. BURNES. I now demand the regular order.

EXPENSES OF "TRUST" INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SHAW. I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 30, 1888.

Mr. BACON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

"Resolved, That a sum not to exceed $5,000 shall be immediately available and payable out of the contingent fund of the House on order of the chairman and one member of the Committee on Manufactures of the House, in sums not exceeding $1,000 at one time, to meet the expenses of said committee in further continuing the inquiry and investigation ordered by resolution of this House adopted January 25, 1888, and heretofore ordered to be continued after the close of the present session, and that vouchers for any such expenditures shall be always certified to by the chairman and one member of the committee."

The Committee on Accounts to whom was referred the accompanying resolution concerning an appropriation out of the contingent fund of the House to meet the expenses of the Committee on Manufactures in continuing the inquiry and investigation ordered by resolution of the House adopted January 25, 1888, and heretofore ordered to be continued, have considered the same and recommend its adoption.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be stated how much money has already been assigned for the use of this committee and how much has been expended.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, the committee has already had $5,000 placed at its disposal. How much of it has been expended I am unable to say. The committee has asked for more money, and the presumption is that the sum already appropriated has been exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the committee been sitting elsewhere than at the Capitol, or here alone?

Mr. SHAW. I presume the chairman of the committee [Mr. BACON] or the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] can answer that question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee is now ill and at his home, but I am familiar with the proceedings of the committee. The committee has been making inquiry with regard to a very extensive subject, which has occasioned the summoning of numerous witnesses, many of them from a distance. The amount which was at the disposal of the committee for this purpose was only $5,000, and it has been substantially exhausted in these necessary inquiries. I think that in one or two cases the inquiries have run over more ground than may really have been necessary, but those are minor incidents which can not always be foreseen. There is no doubt in the mind of any member of the committee on either side of the House that the inquiry is a very important one; that it is far more extensive, and consequently more expensive, than any person who has never had occasion to give special attention to the subject would suppose; that the inquiry is of vital importance to the people of the country, and that to prosecute it to a proper conclusion an increase of the fund is indispensable.

Now, I believe that in an inquiry of this character, where the expenses can not be accurately foreseen, but where they are as nothing compared with the importance of the subject under consideration, and where these expenditures are beyond all question in the hands of judicious members of the House, there should be no arbitrary limit upon such moderate sums as are needed to secure the amplest information.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be glad if my friend from Arkansas would give some idea as to the manner of the expenditure of this money; in what way it has been disbursed, whether for witness fees or how?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It has been expended principally in the payment of witness fees. There will be an expenditure for the employment of counsel in one important and very difficult case, the Standard Oil case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Employment of attorneys?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Of counsel once, and then only one attorney, and in the Standard Oil case, was employed by the committee; that being a case, I will state to my friend from Indiana, of great complication, much more than the time would permit me now to explain to the House. The testimony has already been printed to the extent of a limited edition; and the type is up to fill the larger order of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to know what is pending before the House. Up to this time we have been unable on this side to learn what is pending before the House, or the subject-matter of the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas, who seems to be occupying the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been endeavoring to secure order upon the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the Chair be kind enough to inform us what is pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW] has submitted a report from the Committee on Accounts proposing an increase of the allowance for expenditures to the Committee on Manufactures, engaged in the subject of investigating certain trusts. The chairman of the Committee on Manufactures is not present, and the gentleman from Arkansas is explaining to the House the reason for this proposed increase.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The testimony taken in regard to the Standard Oil trust covers within a few pages of 1,000 pages, and it was not deemed possible for the committee to make that thorough and painstaking inquiry into the intricacies of this particular trust without the aid, not simply of counsel, but of selected counsel that had had occasion heretofore to follow it through all of its various ramifications. With that single exception the expenditures on the part of the committee, so far as I am acquainted with them—and while I am not chairman of the committee I think I know what has been done in that regard—have been solely in the payment of expenses and fees of witnesses; and I will state to the House that so far as the counsel to whom I have just referred is concerned, his fee is left solely to the discretion of the committee, and the House need not have any doubt or hesitation on that score.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the fee been fixed?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It has not been fixed by the committee that I know of. The chairman is at present unable to be here, and I, as a member of the committee, am only able to give such information as is within my own personal knowledge, which is doubtless not so complete in details as might have been afforded to the House if the chairman of the committee himself were able to be present.

Mr. BREWER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas, with his permission, if the committee has taken any testimony regarding the sugar trust?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; I will state in reply to the gentleman from Michigan that extensive testimony has been taken in this regard, and, in the opinion of the committee, it has been covered adequately The committee has made a preliminary report to the House conveying the information obtained so far upon that and other subjects. That document will be subject to the order of the members of the House, I suppose, in a few days, as soon as the printing can be done. I will state further to the gentleman that if he or any other member desires for immediate use a printed copy of the testimony taken so far, there are a few copies, some fifty or sixty in all, in the committee-room, but of course not enough for general distribution.

Mr. BREWER. Has not the committee proceeded far enough so as to present some bill to the House to meet this question of trusts?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I do not think so, and I will supplement that opinion by this statement: That trusts are of various characters. There are such trusts, for instance, as the Standard Oil trust, which is in no wise affected by foreign competition, or need not be. There are such trusts as the sugar trust that exist wholly under what we know as our protective system of taxation; and there is further such a trust as the whisky trust that is popularly supposed to exist under the internal-revenue system of taxation. The committee has made inquiry into the Standard Oil and sugar trusts, two very extensive inquiries, and on yesterday the committee concluded what I consider the final examination into the question of the whisky trust. That testimony has yet to be printed, and until it has all been obtained, and perhaps also until the additional subject of these commercial combinations known as "dealing in futures" and matters of that character, until these have been gone over it may be impossible for the committee to make a report in as comprehensive a way as any gentleman who has served in connection with the subject will consent that the report ought to be made.

Mr. BREWER. I will ask the gentleman if he will not yield to me for three minutes to have read a letter in regard to the sugar trust, which I desire to have laid before the House at this time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will yield that time to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. BREWER. I ask to have this letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LANSING, MICH., August 4, 1888.

DEAR SIR: As that great "octopus," the sugar trust, has advanced price of sugar in the past six months more than 33 per cent., would not Congress be warranted in passing a bill for the relief of the people, allowing sugar to come in duty free for sixty or ninety days? Certainly this or something else should be done by Congress to relieve the masses as well as the manufacturers in this country. We have a small institution here making condensed milk. Ten months ago we were paying 5¼ to Philadelphia and New York refineries for Crown A granulated sugar delivered here. Now they are charging us 8¼ for the same article, and as our trade is largely with South America, China, Mexico, and the East and West Indies, we are necessarily competitors of the Swiss and English manufacturers, who are buying sugar at the old rates. The tax now put upon us amounts to over $100 per day, which makes it very difficult for us to continue in business. Of course Congress should take no action looking to our relief; but if the effect is as above on a little concern like ours, what must it be upon the great masses, none of whom can get along without sugar. We are paying the farmers in this country more than twice the amount they ever received before for milk, our price this year being equivalent to wheat at, at least, $2 per bushel; so it is not only important for us but for the farming community depending upon us for a market that we should continue the business. But we shall be forced to close up unless the grip of the sugar trust is loosened. If Congress would allow the public to bring in sugar duty free for, say, ninety days, they could then protect themselves. Unless some action is taken such concerns as ours will be either obliged to close up or join the procession and become monopolists themselves. We could form a condensed-milk trust and continue to live, but the best way is to strangle the sugar trust, and leave all such business open to healthy competition.

Yours, truly,

MICHIGAN CONDENSED MILK COMPANY.
JAMES M. TURNER.

Hon. MARK S. BREWER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to state that the gentleman who writes that letter, being the president of the company, is well informed on this business. It is a very large business in my district, and I have simply had the letter read for the purpose of showing the result arising from this great sugar trust, not only upon this one industry but upon all the industries of the country, and it seems to me that that committee which has so fully investigated this subject-matter ought to be able to report some measure for the purpose of meeting it. I desire to ask the gentleman if the committee have also investigated the question as to the adulteration of sugar and the use of glucose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. They have. Mr. Speaker, I would state in connection with the observations of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] that the interesting letter which he submits calls attention to one character of trusts and suggests a remedy. Now, as indicated by what I previously said, there are more kinds of trusts than one. The sugar trust is precisely the same as the pig-iron association in its effect upon prices, and as the steel-rail association, and the bagging pool or trust that has in the past few days put up the price of bagging to the full extent of the tariff limit, as the oil-cloth trust, and forty other trusts or associations that we have in the country. It is one of the multitude of trusts which exist under the tariff, and is not one of those equally objectionable trusts which exist outside of the tariff and in commodities which can not be imported, in commodities in regard to which we can not invoke international competition as a regulator, because of not being produced abroad. The remedy is another question. Ninety days on the free-list would undoubtedly stop the matter for ninety days.

The bill that passed the House the other day, known as the Mills bill, cuts the profits of the sugar trust and cuts the margin of protection over $11,000,000, independent of the reduction of revenue. If that bill had simply reduced the raw sugar and refined sugar upon identically parallel lines it would have left the sugar trust with the same margin of profit conferred by law and the same extent of power over prices that it possesses to-day; but although the margin of protection was increased by the tariff act of 1883, and it was stated by experts and sustained by our friends on the other side of the House as being in no sense too much, yet we cut the margin of protection at least 30 cents on the hundred pounds upon an average. Now, the remedy for a trust of that character is to cut the margin of protection, as has been done, and not simply for ninety days, but permanently, and to cut to the point at which the competition of the world may be invoked, not sufficient to destroy the industries of this country, but to leave them only that protection which is necessary for their support, and to destroy the power to needlessly extort money from the people of this country. That step has been taken to a degree by the bill which just passed the House, but not to that degree which would amount to free trade in sugar.

We do not need to touch raw sugar to stop the oppression of the trust; but only to lessen the margin between the lower tax on raw sugar and the higher tax on refined sugar. Whatever report the Committee on Manufactures must make, will have to deal not only with the sugar trust and with trusts like unto the sugar trust, but also with trusts like unto the Standard Oil trust, and like unto the whisky trust and others that yet may be looked into and about which I am not prepared to state anything, although some are very plain as to remedy and all that now, until they have received the attention of the committee. The constituent of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] is upon the right line of remedy for the kind of trust he deals with, only that he needs to put only refined sugar on the free-list; but it is a question of degree, and I hope the committee will give cordial support to what is necessary to give substantial relief to the people of this country.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], but before doing that, if the gentleman will excuse me, I promised to yield to a question by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. The point upon which I wanted information from the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is whether or not he spoke of the examination, among other questions, of dealing in futures as being among the duties which would devolve upon this committee. I wish to inquire whether there has been an investigation to any extent upon this subject; and, if so, whether the committee has come to any conclusion upon the question of the power of the Congress of the United States to inhibit this dealing in futures, which so materially interferes with the price in the regular open market.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will say to the gentleman that that line of inquiry is doubtless covered by the duties imposed upon the committee; but that division of the inquiry has not yet been taken up. They will probably pass to the consideration of it when they next meet and have summarized their proceedings down to date.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield at this point for an inquiry?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] indicated that he desired to ask a question.

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to have the gentleman yield me three or four minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I thought the gentleman wished to ask a question. I will gladly yield him time after others to whom I have promised to yield. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] desires now to make an inquiry.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether the Committee on Manufactures have had their attention called to a trust recently formed as to the subject of cotton bagging. The gentleman is aware that when the Committee on Ways and Means gave some attention to that subject not long ago cotton bagging was worth about 6½ cents a yard. Now it is reported that it has been put up to 11 cents and a fraction a yard. I would be glad to know whether the gentleman has any information as to how that has been accomplished.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the committee has no information on that subject further than what is possessed by other gentlemen on the floor. We are cognizant of the fact as a matter of common notoriety. I see it stated by merchants and by market reports, and I presume it is true, and it will undoubtedly be a proper matter for the committee to give attention to, if the position involved is not already sufficiently covered by other inquiries. Gentlemen can readily see that it is not necessary for the committee to investigate every trust of a given class, for if they undertook to do that they would occupy not only the time of this Congress but very likely the whole of the time of the coming Congress in making what would be practically duplicated investigations. When we have gotten a typical organization of a particular class, that will probably be as far as it is necessary for the committee to consume time or to entail expense in that direction.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas whether the tariff has been changed so as to cause this rise in the price of cotton bagging since the Committee on Ways and Means were consulted on the subject?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In reply to the gentleman's question I will say that the present tariff affords to the manufacturers of cotton bagging a protection of 3 cents a yard, and that a few weeks ago they were not in a pool or a trust, the former one being broken up, and they were getting along very well at prices which were less than foreign bagging of the same weight could be laid down here for, judging from the prices of similar articles.

The Committee on Ways and Means thought that these manufacturers were able to get along without any duty, but the claims for some protection were urged upon various grounds with so much evidence of sincerity of belief and so much earnestness that the committee put into the bill a protection, not of 3 cents a yard, but of three-quarters of 1 cent a yard; and it is in the face of this proposed reduction, not increase, that the bagging manufacturers have formed this pool and put up the price from 7½ and 8 cents a yard to 11 cents, so as to take the entire 3 cents a yard protection which the law at this time permits to them, but which of course will not be permitted if the bill which we have passed becomes law.

Mr. BRUMM. Then I understand the gentleman to say that the prospective decrease in the tariff has been the means of raising the price of cotton bagging so suddenly and so largely?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman had listened to me I think he would have understood me to say just the reverse of that. They hastened to reform the trust or pool so as to grab while they can.

Mr. BRUMM. That is no answer to my question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It is the prospective decrease of the tariff embargo against competition from 3 cents to three-fourths of a cent a yard that has caused them hastily to rush together and grab all the bounty the tariff now gives them and will continue to give them while you and your associates permit it to exist in its present form. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] has asked whether any bill has been prepared by the Committee on Manufactures looking to the suppression of trusts. I believe the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has answered that no bill has yet been prepared by that committee. I desire to state to the House that during the past winter I spent some time in considering a proposition of that kind, which I introduced here a few weeks ago in the form of a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That bill is quite short, and I wish to ask attention to its provisions. I will ask the Clerk to read it, and gentlemen will see that it provides for taxing the product of trusts to the extent of 40 per cent. of their value, so that if the bill should become a law trusts would cease to exist from and after its passage. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any merchandise, manufacture, commodity, or product manufactured or produced in the United States shall be manufactured or produced by persons, partnerships, or corporations who shall be parties to any agreement or agreements, combination or combinations, trust or trusts for the purpose of limiting the supply or production thereof, and whenever any merchandise, manufacture, commodity, or product shall be purchased or held by parties, partnerships, or corporations who shall be parties to any agreement or agreements, combination or combinations, trust or trusts for the purpose of controlling the prices thereof, or the market therefor, on all such merchandise, manufactures, commodities, and products manufactured, produced, purchased, or held by said parties there shall be, during the continuance of such agreement or agreements, combination or combinations, trust or trusts, assessed and collected in addition to all other taxes now imposed by law, internal taxes to be paid by the manufacturer, producer, or holder thereof, equal in amount to 40 per cent. of the value of such manufacture, commodity, or product.

SEC. 2. That all the provisions of existing law in reference to internal-revenue taxes and their assessment and collection, and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and liens prescribed in such laws, shall, so far as applicable, extend to, include, and apply to the taxes imposed by this act, and to the persons, partnerships, and corporations upon whom they are imposed. Whenever such agreement, combination, or trust shall cease to exist the internal taxes imposed by this act shall not be assessed or collected on such merchandise, manufacture, commodity, or product as may thereafter be manufactured, produced, or purchased by the parties aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That there shall be no allowance of drawback on the merchandise, manufactures, commodities, or products on which taxes have been assessed or collected under the provisions of this act when the same are exported to foreign countries, either as to the taxes imposed by this act or as to the taxes imposed by any other provision of law, upon such merchandise, manufactures, commodities, or products.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations and appoint all the agents that may be necessary for the carrying into effect of this act.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask whether the proposition just read can be submitted as an amendment or substitute for the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX). The Chair can not decide that question until a motion to that effect is submitted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I make this inquiry because if that can be done we can avoid the expense of appropriating $5,000 for continuing this investigation, as this bill seems to meet the case exactly.

Mr. SPRINGER. The proposition before the House is simply a resolution from the Committee on Accounts. This which I have asked the Clerk to read is a bill, and could not, I presume, be moved as an amendment. I was about to state, however, that as soon as the present proposition is disposed of I shall ask unanimous consent to have this bill taken up for immediate consideration, so that we may pass upon it and let it go to the Senate.

This bill proposes to impose upon the products of "trusts" an internal-revenue tax equal to 40 per cent. of the value of those products, and also to impose a tax of equal amount upon articles purchased for the purpose of procuring a rise in the market, or for the purpose of "cornering" the market. If a measure of this kind be passed, Mr. Speaker, its effect will be instantaneous, and the remedy will go clear to the bottom of this whole difficulty.

There is precedent in the legislation of Congress for a procedure of this kind. Some years ago a tax of 10 per cent. was placed upon the circulating notes of the State banks. That tax never produced any revenue; but it did stop the circulation of such notes; so that there has never been any note of that description circulated in this country since that tax was imposed. This bill, I presume, will not raise any revenue; but it will put a stop to the "trusts" which exist in this country; for after they have paid 40 per cent. upon the products which they create they will not be able to exist under the operation of this bill. I give notice that as soon as the pending resolution is disposed of I shall ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the committee which has been pursuing the inquiry into the subject of "trusts" has made any investigation of the "cattle trust" of Chicago, which for two or three years past has been depressing the price of cattle in the West and plundering the farmers of that region to the amount of $55,000,000 annually in excess of a legitimate profit?

Mr. WEAVER. You mean what is called "the meat and cattle trust?"

Mr. DOCKERY. I mean the cattle trust of Chicago, consisting of five men. That "trust" has dominated and controlled the cattle market of the entire West to the great detriment of the farming interests, and I trust, sir, that this committee will make its inquiry thorough, so as to be able to offer a remedy that will afford our people the needed relief.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] that the Committee on Manufactures, as he will see when he comes to read the testimony, has gone over a vast deal of ground; that the question of the meat and cattle trust has been spoken of, but has not yet been a subject of inquiry. It is, of course, a very important subject; but gentlemen of the House would hardly justify the committee, nor would a long-suffering country justify us in taking up time to make so exhaustive an inquiry as would be necessary to determine everything relating to every "trust" in the country.

Sir, no one can cast his eye over the industrial signs of the times, or observe the conclusive proofs which we have upon every hand, and fail to see that the people of our country have in a large measure had their estates put in liquidation by the operations of these trusts and of the laws now on the statute-books which encourage, protect, and permit them; and if there was ever on the face of the earth a people against whom consolidations have been organized, with powers guarantied and conveyed, to oppress and plunder the people, then in this nineteenth century and under the genius of our present peculiar statutes that is the fate and condition of the American people to-day. What we need at this time is to get sufficient data in regard to the different classes of these organizations; and when we find a broad and sound basis upon which to generalize, then we can, with what I trust will be conclusive proof, urge measures which will reach down to the lowest roots of these organizations, and of all similar existing class legislation, and leave the country unshackled and free.

I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I fear the suggestion of my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has induced his colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] to propose a matter which seems to me entirely foreign to the resolution offered by the Committee on Accounts. While I know that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is exceedingly zealous in everything he undertakes and always manifests a great deal of earnestness, I think the bill which he has had read to the House would probably not be a cognate subject which could be attached to the proposition now pending, which, as I understand, is simply a proposition to enable the Committee on Manufactures to go on further with the valuable investigation which they are now making and which is calculated to benefit and instruct the House and the country. I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. SHAW] will be considered disconnected from any proposition so entirely foreign to its purposes and objects as that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not intend to move my proposition as an amendment to the pending resolution. I simply gave notice that after this is disposed of I would ask unanimous consent to have my measure considered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I now yield five or six minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. CANNON. Is any time to be yielded to this side of the House?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I will not forget the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has made the only request coming from his side of the House.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will give way now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; go on.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I am here as a member of this House under peculiar instructions in reference to questions of this character. Those who selected me to speak for them have taken decided grounds against all "trusts" of every character, and it is in their name and in their behalf that I ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes.

I did not hear read the resolution now pending, but I heard the bill of my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. I believe there is but one way to deal with these "trusts," and that is to declare them contraband of the public interest and against the public good. Declare them to be illegal by act of Congress. Attach a penalty to the circulation of the certificates of these trusts when they are issued. After these corporations have been formed, I would frame the law in such a way that it would be similar to the law against the counterfeiting of Government notes. I would render it a penal offense to pass from hand to hand certificates of trusts as formed by any one of these corporations or associations. I would render it impossible, as far as the law could do it, to circulate any certificates of trusts, whether sugar trusts or any other trust.

Something must be done of a definite and positive character in order to meet the growing evil now presenting itself for the consideration of the people of the country.

We may be told this question can be reached by the modification of the tariff. No, sir; no tariff can reach this question. It must be reached, if at all, by imposing a heavy penalty upon those who attempt to deal in the certificates of any one of these trusts, so that those who indulge in this sort of thing will know that whatever money they put into these corporations will be lost to them just so soon as their dealing in them is detected.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would be in favor of any measure that would look in that direction. I am opposed to the passage of any bill which will recognize trusts in any way or give them the slightest legal recognition, directly or indirectly. I remember during the war that Congress passed a law taxing lotteries. Most of the States had enacted laws of their own declaring lotteries to be illegal, and yet, under the act of Congress imposing a tax on lotteries, it was claimed they thereby became legalized organizations under that act, and contrary to the State laws they went on and sold their tickets and slips and robbed and skinned the poor people of America out of millions of dollars.

They should all be treated alike. Every one of these trusts should be placed upon the same basis. All of them are against public interest and public policy. By act of Congress they should be so declared. Any bill which will go that far will have my vote on the floor of this House. The bill which has been introduced and which the gentleman from Illinois has suggested he will ask for the consideration and adoption of, when it comes up regularly I give notice now I will then ask that it shall be amended to protect the people as far as possible on the part of Congress against this entire illegal and outrageous evil.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Illinois desires to be heard, and I ask him what time he wishes.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of giving to the Committee on Manufactures whatever sums of money may be necessary to enable it to prosecute efficiently the investigation with which it is charged by the resolution of the House touching "trusts."

Something has been said by my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] and all the gentlemen who have talked touching the desirability of legislation that will break up these combinations and prevent the formation of other "trusts." The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] seems to be of opinion that the Committee on Manufactures has not taken sufficient evidence and given the matter sufficient consideration to justify it in recommending legislation by the reporting of a bill.

From testimony reported by that committee and other committees and from general knowledge that both the House and country has, effective legislation, in my opinion, could and should be enacted that would break up some of the "trusts." For example, take the whisky "trust;" much could be done by repealing the three-year bond provision. That motion was made by way of amendment to the tariff bill when it was under consideration by the House by my colleague [Mr. HITT], and was voted down by substantially a solid vote of the Democratic majority against a substantially solid vote of the Republican minority.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] states that the sugar "trust" has its life in our protective system and lives by virtue of our revenue laws alone. It is true that it lives, breathes, and has its being in the revenue laws; but it is not true that in any proper sense, in fact or theory, that it comes within the list of our protected industries. So far as it goes it constitutes a tariff near to the Democratic plank—a tariff for revenue only. We do not need the income which it yields, and the very moment we legislate to give to the people free sugar that moment the sugar "trust" dies.

When the Mills bill was being considered in the House my Republican colleague from Iowa [Mr. FULLER] moved an amendment to take all duty off sugar. The Republicans substantially voted for it and the Democrats voted solid against it, and you still have the sugar trust with you. Then the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] moved to reduce the duty on sugar one-half, which would have largely broken down the trust. Again the Republicans almost solid voted "ay" and the Democrats voted solid "no." Various amendments were offered by myself and others that would have given the people cheaper sugar and broken down the "trust," the Republicans voting "ay" and the Democrats invariably voting solid "no."

Mr. Speaker, I tell the gentlemen the country wants action, wise legislation touching all these matters, and the gentlemen do not fool anybody when they fail to propose proper legislation and defeat apt legislation when we propose it, and then turn around and vex the air by mere words.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] compares the sugar trust with the alleged iron and steel-rail "trust," but they are not on all fours at all.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there is more duty collected annually upon sugar—almost strictly revenue duty at that—than there is upon the hundreds of articles on the chemical schedule, drugs, dyes, and medicines, upon all wool imported and manufactures thereof, and upon iron and steel and all manufactures thereof combined.

The sugar produced in this country annually is of the value of $12,000,000, while the value of the other articles mentioned produced in this country annually is $1,000,000,000. At the same time the production of these articles give employment to millions of our citizens, and their value by home competition has been greatly reduced to the consumer since their production was promoted by protection. And yet, Mr. Speaker, we are told that they rest upon all fours with sugar.

Mr. Speaker, we know far more about what is proper legislation touching some of these matters called "trusts," in my opinion, than the gentleman from Arkansas has been willing to admit. But there is a disposition not to utilize the knowledge we have, and to put action over on the plea of further investigation, to get knowledge about things with regard to which we do not fully know, while in reference to the things with regard to which we have knowledge we might proceed to legislate without further delay.

Now, then, I did not intend to discuss the tariff. I did not intend to say a word about the subject, and would not have done so were it not that gentlemen as it seemed to me were seeking to place matters in a false light.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, the House should by all means vote this additional sum recommended by the Committee on Accounts to enable the Committee on Manufactures to further prosecute its inquiry concerning trusts.

The subject of trusts is not by any means a new one in the history of the commercial world. In the days following the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Sir John Culpepper said in the English Parliament that the trusts and similar monopolies had overrun England like vermin, and that country was compelled to pass what was known as the "Bubble act," and as far back in English jurisprudence as the time when Lord Coke was Lord Chief-Justice of England, his decision in the famous monopoly cases, reported in the 11th Coke, was to the effect that these combinations or trusts were in restraint of trade and therefore illegal and not to be tolerated.

But, sir, the trusts conquered England, and the Bubble act was repealed. England surrendered to the trusts, which have conquered wherever they have gained a foothold, and they are now in the ascendant here, and it yet remains to be seen whether the trusts are strong enough to permanently dominate commercial life in the young Republic, or whether we shall be successful in grappling with and overthrowing them. We have meat trusts, cattle trusts, sugar trusts, lumber trusts, steel trusts, envelope trusts, nail trusts, and God only knows what else, for their name is legion.

The House should not hesitate, in my judgment, a moment to pass the bill just read from the Clerk's desk and introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], which I believe to be thoroughly sound and admirably drawn. It is not the result of hasty action, but is the deliberate judgment of its author after giving to the subject careful attention and consideration; and while I want this resolution to be adopted, because it is important that we should know where these trusts exist and what may be their ramifications—but let us provide by law after we have ascertained the facts, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, to crush them out of existence, destroy them, root and branch, and relieve the people from these unlawful and unnatural restrictions upon commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON].

[Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The tax on sugar, which seems to be receiving the attention of the gentlemen on the other side to a considerable extent, is logically divisible into two parts. One is the tax on raw sugar, which is unfit for consumption, and the other is the tax on refined sugar, which is fit for consumption. Now, if there be a tax of 2 cents a pound on raw sugar of the full complement of saccharine matter which will yield a pound of refined sugar, and there be only a tax of 2 cents on the refined sugar, then the sugar-refining industry of this country would stand upon a free-trade basis so far as the home market is concerned and so far as the protection afforded it is concerned, because the protection that it would receive upon the refined or finished product would be exactly equivalent to the tax that would be laid upon the raw product. But if there be a tax of [illegible] cents on raw sugar such as is unfit for consumption, and there be a tax of 3½ cents on all refined sugar fit for consumption, as is substantially the case now, then there would be a protection of 1½ cents per pound. That would be a margin of protection on which a trust could exist and under which, if it did exist, as one now does, it could oppress the people and extort money from them, as the sugar trust and many other similar trusts now do.

I repeat what I have said before, that you do not need to touch raw sugar, from which alone we derive revenue, to crush or to take away all power to oppress the people from the sugar trust. It is true that you can do this by increasing the tax on raw sugar so as to take up the present margin between raw and refined sugar. But unless we need more revenue it is better to get rid of this margin by lowering the tax on refined sugar down closer to that which we maintain on raw sugar. The margin between the two rates of taxation that are maintained respectively on what is known as raw sugar and on what is known as refined sugar is the key to the trust question in this case.

Now, sir, as to the location of sugar refineries. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON] speaks of the sugar trust as a Southern trust. There is, I believe, but one sugar refinery in all the South. The great seats of this industry are Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Boston, and San Francisco. The proper spirit however is not to ask the location of an evil, but to determine the character and extent of the evil and to apply the remedy in a broad, prudent, and patriotic spirit.

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. Was not the gentleman a member of the Ways and Means Committee that framed the tariff bill?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEAR. Then why did you not, when you were considering your bill, provide for the tax on sugars under 16, as you originally prepared it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Sugar under 13 is raw sugar and unfit for consumption. Sugar above No. 13 and of No. 16 is sugar fit for consumption. Now, if you are going to put sugar fit for consumption between 13 and 14 or 16 on the free-list, then you virtually put all sugar on the free-list.

And I may say to the gentleman that from first to last I opposed putting one grade of refined sugar upon the free-list when it was clear that prudence forbade the putting of all refined sugars on the free-list, or, in other words, at just the tax as that on raw sugars.

I did not consider it a wise, just, and philosophic way of treating an industry. If raw sugar could justly be put upon the free-list, then refined sugar could stand a corresponding reduction. We could fairly consider the whole or any part of this step in this order. We could do more. We could see if the margin of protection between raw and refined be not greater than need be.

Only five years ago your party said it was not big enough, and you increased it. We have reduced the margin to a lower point than it was before your increase. I think this beneficent and safe. But to make a flank movement upon an industry is, in my opinion, no way to proceed. I think this step would have that effect. I always held and earnestly urged this view. I believed in reducing the margin, and all of the Democratic members of the committee did. I wanted to take back all the increase your side gave them five years ago, and more, too, and we did that in the Mills bill. To leave no margin would possibly kill this industry. I do not want to kill it. I only want to reform the abuses.

Mr. GEAR. The gentleman was in favor of favoring the sugar refiners.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is exactly what I was not in favor of, and our action shows it. If we favor them when we reduce their margin and amount of protection, what did you do when you increased it in 1883? It is strange that gentlemen will not recognize plain facts, such as that three is not as much as four, that 30 cents per 100 pounds taken off of the margin of protection for refining leaves the margin less by that much than it was before. We have cut sugar fully twice as much as almost any other article. We have reduced the protection now given by existing law to refiners more than in almost any article not put on the free-list. These are facts, gentlemen. You can not confuse them.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stated as a complaint that sugar brings $58,000,000 into the public Treasury. This is from raw sugar only. Under his own law refined sugar is now taxed for protection at prohibitory rates. Will he help us reduce, as we do by the Mills bill, the subsidy he voted to the refiners? In the last Congress he voted against even considering the question. But come to raw sugar. If we put $200,000,000 into the Treasury by taxes on articles like raw sugar, what is the total cost, direct and indirect, tax and bounty or tax and protection, if you please, to the people? It is, say, roundly, $6,000,000 of protection to Louisiana and about the same to the Hawaiian Islands under our treaty. This makes $12,000,000 of protection. Add this to the tax and it would be a total cost to the people of $212,000,000, all which, except $12,000,000, goes into the Treasury and not into the pockets of protected individuals. If you include the protection for refining them the total subsidy is about $30,000,000.

But, sir, suppose we put $200,000,000 of tariff taxes into the Treasury from articles different from the sugar tax, every item of which kind you gentlemen upon the other side have fought any reduction upon. Take pig-iron for instance; while our insignificant imports of pig-iron yield less than $3,000,000 to the public Treasury, the tax upon raw sugar yields $58,000,000, and while we are put to the added expense of $12,000,000 to get this $58,000,000 from sugar, yet to get less than $3,000,000 revenue from pig-iron we are put to a cost this year of nearly $70,000,000 of protection, $1 to the Treasury and over $20 to offset it to privileged classes. Every dollar of this subsidy is collected just as it is on raw sugar, and the market reports show it. Go on, sir, and put $200,000,000 into the Treasury from articles like pig-iron.

Abolish such taxes as the one on raw sugar, as you now propose, and keep only the other kind, as you are trying to do. Then, sir, your $200,000,000 has been put into the Treasury at a total cost to the people of over $4,000,000,000 a year. These are the kind of taxes you want untouched. This is the true inwardness of all you say about the tax on raw sugar. Fill the public Treasury, as in the case of pig-iron, and empty the pockets of the people. Estimating our production this year at 10,000,000 tons of pig-iron, we shall pay not exceeding $34,000,000 in wages. We tell these people to collect, and their own statements and the market reports show that they do collect, $6.72 a ton protection, or nearly $70,000,000, to enable them to pay their labor, $34,000,000. This is the kind of thing you want. This is what you defend. You ask for the difference in wages and take twice as much as all the wages. Sir, the tax on raw sugar threatens to hurt this arrangement, and we may expect it to be fought for this reason.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman is speaking upon the assumption that the tariff enhances the price of pig-iron.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Upon the actual proof that it does.

Mr. BRUMM. But if, on the contrary, it has no such effect——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. But it has.

Mr. BRUMM. That is a matter of fact.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. It is a matter of fact that it has that effect. If the gentleman will look at the market reports, both foreign and domestic, which I examined only yesterday in the Iron and Steel Bulletin, he will see that every dollar and every cent of the duty on pig-iron goes into the pockets of the manufacturers; and if he will read an article by Mr. Swank in one of the magazines, which I can show him, he will find stress laid upon the fact that they do appropriate every dollar and every cent of the protection which the tariff gives them, and if it were twice what it is, pig-iron being a necessary article, they would still appropriate every dollar and every cent.

To come now to the whisky trust. Sir, there is but one whisky trust. It makes 85 or 90 per cent. of all the whisky and alcohol that are made in this country, and if the internal-revenue tax be a fosterer of that monopoly or trust, then vote for the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] which provides for laying a tax upon every trust in this country. The manufacturers did not consider that the internal-revenue tax was a subsidy when they came here and got every dollar of the internal-revenue taxes repealed except those which exist to-day upon whisky and tobacco and beer. If this internal-revenue tax is a help why were not the others? They clamored about those taxes as an oppression, as a burden upon wealth, and they procured their repeal. And, sir, I venture to say that when the question comes up the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and his party friends will not vote to reduce the tariff taxes that do foster the pig-iron association and the steel rails, or any other of the protected products which lay a burden of ten dollars upon the public for every dollar they put into the Treasury. The whisky and spirit trust is fostered by the $2 per gallon import tax against 90 cents a gallon internal-revenue tax.

There is, I said, one whisky trust which makes from 85 to 90 per cent. of the whisky and alcohol that are produced in this country. That is not the small business done in the State of Kentucky. Some twelve or fifteen million gallons are made in Kentucky; but nearly 100,000,000 gallons are made in the whole country. Where is the trust whose "joint behests" demand that that everybody else says is a burden in their business and has had repealed? That trust has its headquarters and its largest distilleries at Peoria, Ill., a State represented in part by the gentleman [Mr. CANNON] himself, and yet whenever he speaks here of trusts or of "the whisky trust," he points to another part of the map.

Mr. SHAW. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHAW moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXATION OF TRUSTS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I have sent to the desk, and that it be immediately considered in the House.

Mr. LONG. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is there a report from any committee upon this bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. It has not been reported. There has been no meeting of the Committee of Ways and Means since the bill was referred to it. My motion is that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

Mr. LONG. Regular order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Who demands the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts on the left [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. I simply want to save the time.

Mr. DUNN. He wants to save the time and the trusts.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will persuade his friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] to let this bill be considered at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will get the Committee of Ways and Means, of which he is a member and to which this bill has been referred, to report it to this House, so that we can enforce its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BURNES. I move to dispense with the regular order.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it is not known who objected to the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] objected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. I again ask unanimous consent that the morning hour for the presentation of reports be dispensed with, and that committees have leave to file their reports at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore proceeded to call the committees for reports.

STREET RAILWAY AND WAGON BRIDGE ACROSS THE RIO GRANDE.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11118) reported as a substitute for House bill 11070, to authorize the construction of a street railway and wagon bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico, and to take it up for consideration at this time. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the Santa Fé Street Railway Company, a corporation organized and created under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, to construct, own, maintain, and operate a street railway and wagon bridge across the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, in the State of Texas, and Paso del Norte, State of Chihuahua, Mexico, at such point as may be most convenient to said corporation, to unite and connect a street railway to be constructed by it in the said city of El Paso with any street railway that may be constructed by any person, persons, or company in said Paso del Norte; and to build and lay on and across said bridge ways for the passage of animals, foot passengers, and vehicles of all kinds, and for the transit of freight, goods, wares, and merchandise, for which said corporation may charge a reasonable rate, which charge shall be subject to revision and regulation from time to time by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall be built of good, substantial material, and of such strength and dimensions as may be sufficient to render the passage of all such vehicles, animals, and persons as are herein mentioned perfectly safe at any and all times.

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river, and in case of any litigation arising from an obstruction or an alleged obstruction to free navigation thereof, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be tried before the circuit or district court of the United States for the State in which any portion of said bridge may be situated.

SEC. 4. That equal privileges in the use of said bridge may be granted to all telegraph companies, and the United States reserves the right for the establishment of a postal telegraph across said bridge.

SEC. 5. That the consent of the State of Chihuahua, United States of Mexico, and of the proper authorities of the Republic of Mexico, shall be obtained before said bridge shall be built or commenced.

SEC. 6. That unless the construction of said bridge be commenced within one year and finished within three years from the date of the passage of this act the provisions of this act shall be null and void.

SEC. 7. That Congress reserves the right to withdraw the authority and power conferred by this act in case the free navigation of said river shall be substantially and materially obstructed by said bridge, and for any other reason, and to direct the removal or necessary modification thereof at the cost and expense of the owners of said bridge; and Congress may at any time alter, repeal, or amend this act.

The report (by Mr. CRISP) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred H. R. 11070, "A bill to authorize the construction of a street railway and wagon-road over the Rio Grande, between the city of El Paso, Tex., and Paso del Norte, Mexico," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

The bridge contemplated in this act is to be built across the Rio Grande, the boundary stream between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, and has for its object the accommodation of a large amount of traffic and travel, which is increasing daily, between the two cities of Paso del Norte and El Paso, the two border towns of the United States of Mexico and of the United States of America, respectively, and the adjacent countries.

The joint consent of the Congress of the United States and the proper authorities of the United States of Mexico is necessary before the construction of said bridge can be undertaken.

Your committee was shown duly-authenticated documentary evidence that the consent of the Mexican Government, that of the State of Chihuahua, and that of the municipality of Paso del Norte has been granted to one Felipe Arellano, as representative of the Santa Fé Street Railway Company, to construct and operate such street railway bridge and its approaches as may be situate in Mexican territory, and to connect with a similar work established on United States territory by said Santa Fé Street Railway Company, the documents referred to being—

First. A contract made between General Carlos Pacheco, secretary of public works, representing the executive power of the union, and Mr. Felipe Arellano for the construction of an international bridge across the Rio Grande and two iron tracks across the same bridge, which are to connect with the tramways of Paso del Norte.

Second. An edict of Señor Don Lauro Carrillo, substitute constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of Chihuahua, proclaiming to the inhabitants thereof the ratification by the constitutional congress of that State of a concession granted by the executive of the State of Chihuahua to Felipe Arellano for the construction and operation of two lines of street railway in Paso del Norte.

Third. An ordinance of the council of the city of Paso del Norte granting the right of way to Felipe Arellano.

Your committee was further furnished proofs that the Santa Fé Street Railway Company is a corporation duly organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, and that it has been granted right of way by the city council of El Paso, Tex., for passengers and freight. The consent of the Congress of the United States is therefore the only condition prerequisite to the construction of this bridge.

Your committee, being deeply impressed with the fact that the interests of commerce will be greatly subserved by the proposed bridge, and convinced that the navigation of the river will not suffer by its construction, beg leave to recommend the passage of the bill reported as a substitute for H. R. 11070.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNES. I now demand the regular order.

Mr. WILKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill, as I am going away?

Mr. BURNES. On that account I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask unanimous consent to consider at this time the bill (S. 351) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Zanesville, Ohio.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. WILKINS. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that now.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is one of the bills heretofore vetoed, and upon which the House has taken action adversely. I regret to do anything in opposition to the views of my friend from Ohio, but I am compelled in this case to make objection.

Mr. BURNES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to further consider appropriation bills.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I send to the desk and ask to have read an article which appears in the Philadelphia Press of this date.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUEER PUBLIC DOCUMENTS—A MISSISSIPPI CONGRESSMAN'S NAME CARRIES PATENT-MEDICINE "ADS" FREE—A BOSTON COMPANY'S ECONOMY—SUCH VIOLATION OF THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE A MISDEMEANOR PUNISHABLE BY HEAVY FINES—A POSTAL OFFICIAL'S COMMENTS.

A scheme has just leaked out in this city under which the franking privilege of a member of Congress has been used to send patent-medicine advertisements through the mail free of postage. This is in direct violation of the United States statutes on the subject, which imposes a fine for each and every offense.

D. T. McCool is a dealer in second-hand furniture at 1827 South Eighth Street. He is an active Republican and takes as much interest in national politics as he does in local fights. About 9 o'clock on Monday morning the letter-carrier on that route walked into McCool's little store and handed Mr. McCool a big official-looking envelope. It was about 12 inches long by 9 inches wide. Up in one corner was printed: "Public Document, House of Representatives, U. S. Part of Cong. Record. Free." In the other corner was written "J. M. Allen," and underneath the name were the printed letters "M. C." It was the regulation envelope to be used for just the purpose that appeared on its face. Mr. McCool wondered why he should receive such a document from Congressman Allen, and on tearing open the envelope, which was sealed up, he was more surprised than ever.

The inclosure was not a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, nor did it in any way pertain to the National Government, unless Uncle Sam has taken an interest in a patent-medicine manufactory. It was two copies of Dam's Herald, published by Dam's Remedy Company, 397 Main street, Charlestown district, Boston, Mass. The papers dilated on the merits of Dam's vegetable remedy, however, admitting that the remedy did not cure everything. On the back of each of the papers was a long string of testimonials from people living in this city, looking as though this edition had been expressly printed for circulation in the city of Philadelphia.
